The public-service corporations in many instances have been operated in a high-handed way by trust officials. Right now you have under your observation in the Department of Justice an investigation of one of the biggest railroad "steals" that ever disgraced this country. I refer to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad episode. The ex-president of that system, Mr. Mellen, under oath, admits that Mr. Morgan and other capitalists who held positions as directors openly robbed the stockholders out of many millions of dollars. In 1903 that railroad system had liabilities of $94,000,000, and more than 22,000 people put their savings into it in the form of stock at $240 a share, which paid annual dividends of 8 and 10 per cent every year. These trust magnates began to plunder it, and after raking in fabulous fortunes through methods that ought to lead them direct into the northeast corner of a penitentiary, the railroad system in 1913 had the enormous liability of $415,000,000, and its stock pays no dividend at all; but the once splendid system is now a financial wreck, a sad monument to the rascality of big business. This is just one little case I am calling to mind.

Nearly all of the great railroad systems of this country have been robbed in the same way. It is made possible through the interlocking directorate. If the big bankers who have the handling of other people's money are permitted to own and control the directors of railroads and steamship lines, as well as other public utilities, the people are going to suffer. Many of these big bankers have demonstrated that they will do shady tricks to get a few extra millions of dollars. The men who compose the many trusts seem to think all the people of the United States are mere slaves, to work to add increased millions to the greedy coffers of the avaricious money kings. Right now these railroad corporations are before the Interstate Commerce Commission endeavoring to be allowed to raise their freight rates. The captains of industry have been quite successful under the Sherman antitrust law in robbing these railroads, and they now have the gall to come up to the Capitol and ask that the servants of the people give them legal permission to rob the people through high freight rates. The American people are not going to stand this much longer. They have demanded relief through legislation, and this Congress must give it to them. The men who toil with their hands—the farmers and the artisans and tradesmen—have turned their eyes toward this Capitol and they are going to watch till relief comes or they will place men in these seats who will transmute their sentiments into law. The people know that no man could get to be worth $800,000,000 in 50 years if the laws were not so fixed that the few can prey on the many. They demand that we correct that evil, and unless I am badly fooled I believe this Congress has done much to correct it. If we pass these antitrust laws properly, I am certain that many millions of our population will see the dawn of a brighter day. If the money power were to continue to dominate this Government as it did before the Democracy came into power, the signs of a revolution would soon be seen on our national horizon, and it would not be a bloodless one, either. The great amalgamation of capital and the greed that seems to animate the powerful men in control of the great wealth of this Republic is a reason for the foundations of our Government to begin to shake. How have these financial kings, many of them common thieves, filling high places, operated for the last few years?

Here is what one of them testified to in Washington City on the 23d day of May, 1914, just one week ago last Saturday: Mr. Charles S. Mellen, ex-president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, being on the witness stand, said Prof. Weyman, of Harvard, got $10,000 a year from the New Haven Railroad for "fanning" fires of sentiment in the railroad's favor; his brother $25 a day and his father $50 a day. Lawyer Wardell got $12,000 and Lawyer Innes $15,000. Many other names were mentioned in this connection. Gentlemen, the idea of such a proposition—the officers of that railroad stealing the stockholders' money to hire a college professor and a few lawyers to fool the people. Listen. Mr. Mellen swore that more than 1,000 newspapers received various sums from the railroad. That is not all. One E. D. Robbins, a lawyer of Hartford, got $100,000 "for the purpose of molding public sentiment in Connecticut in 1907 over a charter." Gentlemen, that is the kind of business many of the captains of industry have been engaged in in all branches of big business. Immense fortunes are spent in spreading propaganda to fool the people, and then the people are robbed threefold to pay it back with big profits. These same henchmen of big money have contributed $50,000 and $100,000 to campaign funds with the nonchalance of a drummer buying a cigar. They did not give that money away, but they gave it with the intention of having a "friend at court," and it seems they never failed to have a friend at court till Democracy put a President in the White House. Do you believe that any honest business man in this country would object to this bill if he understood what it means? We are trying to help the honest and legitimate business of this country, and this law will help. I want to put the criminals in business in the penitentiary and free the American people from the shackles they have been forced to wear all these years. The law ought to give the little man in business the same show that it gives the big, strong financial magnate. The law we are fixing to pass will land the big fellow behind the bars if he wrongfully destroys the business of his little competitor. The powerful trusts of this country have not only held up the public and forced them to pay an exorbitant price for all the necessities of life, but they have been able to hold the produce of the farm down to the minimum price. They have forced the farmers to pay big prices for what they buy and compelled them to accept small prices for what they raise on their farms. This greed of organized wealth has held the wages of the poor men, women, and children in factories and mines down to the lowest scale, and the tills of the powerful have been filled with dollars coined out of this poor, human labor.

Gentlemen, can any man who has a heart that throbs with sympathy and justice oppose the amendments to protect the farmers and the laboring people? I am going to stand by them on every vote. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I was not satisfied with the original language used in the paragraph, neither am I satisfied with the amendment proposed; nevertheless, I will support the amendment. I will do this because it is the best that can be obtained, and I believe will assist, at least in some degree, to make clear the object and purpose of the provision.

That object and purpose is, Mr. Chairman, to definitely state that the provisions of the antitrust laws shall not be so interpreted as to forbid the existence or operation of labor or farmers' organizations instituted for mutual help. With that object and purpose I am in entire sympathy.

I presume there has been no proposition discussed in recent years which has absolutely no valid objection to it that has been more misrepresented and abused. It has been termed a proposal to exempt certain classes from the operation of the law, while others are included; to punish one and release another for the same act; to say that all are not equal before the law. It is none of these things.

Any association of the classes mentioned, or any member who violates the antitrust laws will be liable to their penalties the same as any other association or person. It is merely provided that the organization or legitimate operation of such associations shall not be held to be within the prohibitions of the statute.

NOT WITHIN PURPOSE OF SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT.

Nothing is better established than the fact that such associations were not intended to be included in the Sherman antitrust law. In February, 1890, Senator Sherman introduced his bill making associations or agreements in restraint of trade or to monopolize trade illegal. A month later, and while his bill was pending, the question was raised as to whether under any circumstances it would apply to labor or farmers' organizations. In order to settle this, Senator Sherman himself proposed the following amendment to his bill:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between the laborers, made with a view of lessening the number of hours of labor or increasing their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with a view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products.

This amendment was agreed to by the Senate without a division.

The bill and amendment went to the Senate Judiciary Committee, and was sent back to the Senate without the amendment. When the reason for the omission of the amendment was demanded, Senators George and Vest stated that the amendment had not been included because it was unnecessary; that no one could construe the act so as to include such associations.

Referring to the claim that such organizations might be affected, Senator Sherman said:

It does not interfere in the slightest degree with voluntary associations made to advance the interests of a particular trade or occupation. It does not interfere with the Farmers' Alliance at all, because that is an association of farmers to advance their interests and to improve the growth and manner of production of their crops and to secure intelligent growth and to introduce new methods. No organizations in this country can be more beneficial in their character than farmers' alliances and farmers' associations. And so the combinations of workingmen to promote their interests, promote their welfare, and increase their pay, if you please, to get their fair share in the division of production, are not affected in the slightest degree, nor can they be included in the words or intent of the bill as now reported.

Senator Hoar, who had a large part in the framing of the act, defended the exclusion of labor organizations from the operation of the bill on the broadest grounds. He said:

When you are speaking to regulate the transactions of men who are making corners in wheat or in iron or in woolen and cotton goods, you are aiming at a mere commercial transaction, the beginning and end of which is the making of money for the parties, and nothing else. * * * But when a laborer is trying to raise his wages, or is endeavoring to shorten the hours of his labor, he is dealing with something that touches closely, more closely than anything else, the government and the character of the State itself. * * * I hold therefore that as legislators we may constitutionally, properly, and wisely allow laborers to make associations, combinations, contracts, agreements, for the sake of maintaining and advancing their wages, in regard to which, as a rule, their contracts are to be made with large corporations, who are themselves but an association or combination or aggregation of capital on the other side. When we are permitting or even encouraging that, we are permitting and encouraging what it not only lawful, wise, and profitable, but absolutely essential to the existence of the Commonwealth itself.

The circumstances attending the adoption of the Sherman Antitrust Act are thus referred to that it may be thoroughly understood that the law was not intended to apply to farmers' or labor organizations. The great men who took part in formulating that law did not desire, and did not intend, that under any circumstances any such organizations should be prohibited or punished. The bill could not have had the support of its own sponsors if it had been so interpreted. It could not have passed had it been so understood. There has never been a time since that a law having such interpretation could have passed either House of Congress. What an assumption of superior virtue it is that condemns as unjust and unmoral efforts to make the law in form and substance what was from the first the intention of Congress, and ever has been, and is now, its purpose!

An unfortunate interpretation by the courts has given the act a meaning not intended and not desired. Now we propose to make clear what was intended and what is desired. That is all. To do so is neither novel nor strange. It is being done everywhere in cases where an act is found not to have the intended purpose. If the objects sought to be reached are not secured, the act is enlarged to include the intended objects. If persons or objects not intended to be included or affected are found to be within the terms of the act, it is amended so as to exclude them. And that is what we propose to do here.

It is a strange thing that gentlemen will endeavor to hold included within the prohibition of the statute those things not intended to be included, and thus to compel a submission to penalties on the part of those whom they would not venture even to propose to punish as an independent proposition. Imagine anyone here proposing to make a labor organization illegal, and to punish the efforts of its members to obtain better wages, shorter hours, or better conditions by fine and imprisonment! Who would dare on the floor of this House to introduce and defend a bill making farmers' cooperative associations, designed to obtain better prices, greater market facilities, or cheaper transportation rates unlawful? And yet certain persons affect to see in an effort to avoid such calamitous result something questionable and unworthy. I never would have supported a proposition to punish the organization or operation of such associations, and I do not hesitate now to support any legislation necessary to prevent such punishment; and I do so without apology, because I believe it is right and justifiable from every possible standpoint.

THE PROVISION AS AMENDED.

It may be well to state the provision as it will stand if this amendment is adopted:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations instituted for the purposes of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations, orders, or associations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof, nor shall such organizations, orders, or associations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

I am sorry the language used is not clearer. I regret that it contains limitations which may obscure its meaning. The first limitation, that such associations shall be instituted for the purpose of mutual help, is not important, for it would be easy to prove that such was their purpose.

The next limitation, that such associations must not have capital stock, is of more importance, for many strictly cooperative associations issue capital stock to their members as an incident to corporate organization and operation. It is a needless requirement and should have been omitted.

The next requisite, that such associations to be within the benefits of the exclusion must not be conducted for profit, is unnecessary and dangerous. It should have been omitted. Still, I do not give it the broad interpretation given it by some Members. It is true that any association, social, scientific, or literary, may be conducted with profit to its members. But the word "profit" as used in the bill has no such broad meaning It means, and will doubtless be interpreted to mean, conducted for the purpose of obtaining profits as an organization to distribute dividends to its stockholders. Most farmers' cooperative associations would not fall within its terms. Indeed, it is reasonably clear that no cooperative association where the receipts above salaries and operating expenses are returned to the patrons, producers, or consumers of the association would be within the excluded classes. Neither would labor organizations which succeeded in raising wages, although of undoubted "profit" to their members, be within the terms of the statute. "Profit" in a general sense and "profit" in a business transaction are entirely distinct and separate in meaning and application, and it is the latter meaning which is intended in the provision. Still, it would have been better to have omitted language subject to possible misinterpretation. The paragraph should have been entirely recast and its meaning made clear.

But I do not believe Members will be justified in voting against the provision because its language is not all that could be desired. The matter is too important to allow minor imperfections to bring about its defeat. It may secure all we desire. It must better existing conditions. At least it is something gained, a distinct step in advance.

The general purpose is clear. It is to be hoped that in its interpretation the courts will be governed by the larger view. That such is the present trend of decisions is a hopeful sign. As Senator Sherman said in the debate on the great and beneficial act of which he was the author, "It is difficult to define in legal language the precise line between lawful and unlawful combinations."

"Trade" has a broad meaning, and "restraint of trade" is a phrase of wide scope. Many things may result in a restraint of trade entirely innocent and even praiseworthy. Thousands of the agreements of everyday life might be interpreted as a restraint of trade if an absolute meaning is given the term. It is not the purpose of the law to prevent or punish these. The restraint of trade meant in the act is that which is intended to destroy competition, to establish monopoly, to drive out of business an honest competitor. As Senator Sherman said:

It is the unlawful combination, tested by the rules of common law and human experience, that is aimed at by this bill, and not the useful and lawful combination.

It needs no argument to prove that labor organizations to better the conditions of the workingmen and that farmers' organizations to better transport and market the food products of the country ought not to be considered or made by statute unlawful. It is to prevent such result that this provision is inserted in the bill, and for the reasons stated it should receive the support of every just and fair-minded man.

LABOR ORGANIZATIONS.

It is altogether too common to condemn labor unions because of the violence of some frenzied striker. It is quite likely that the outrages of those who represent the employers in labor troubles are at least equal in number and enormity to those chargeable to the strikers. All who really wish for the betterment of conditions and the good order of society hope for a method by which the peaceful settlement of these unfortunate conflicts can be secured. But it is wrong and altogether unjust to condemn all labor organizations because of the violence or crimes of some of their members.

Labor unions have accomplished a great good and are absolutely necessary to protect labor against the exactions and impositions of capital. They have brought about better wages, shorter hours, and better conditions of labor, and such results are not only a blessing to those immediately affected, but they are a blessing to society and the State. It ought to be our desire and effort as legislators to encourage and foster such organizations, and not to discredit and punish them. Manhood and not money is here involved. The welfare and happiness of men, women, and children are here affected, not mere property rights. We are dealing with things vital and sacred, and should not touch them lightly or with selfish or sordid aim.

There are in the United States more than 30,000 local labor associations. Many, perhaps most, of these have agreements with their employers. These agreements relate not only to wages but to many things beneficial alike to employer and employees. If these agreements should be held as restraint of trade, if the organizations should be dissolved and the members sent to jail, the Nation would be shocked and its sense of justice outraged. Yet that is what may occur at any time a Government prosecutor sees fit to institute proceedings. It is to prevent this that the provision under discussion is incorporated in this bill.

It is objected that this legislation is class legislation. If by this is meant that it will not apply to all our population it must be admitted. It does not apply to all of our 100,000,000; it only applies to about 30,000,000. But that is rather a large proportion. It constitutes a considerable interest. Most of our legislation is class legislation if this is class legislation. Nine-tenths of the items of every appropriation are class legislation in this sense. There is no merit in this objection.

The English act of 1875 specifically relieved combinations of wage earners, concerned with questions of wages, working hours, and labor conditions, from the condemnation which the common law applied to combinations in restraint of trade. We are now at this late date only doing what a sense of justice and of sound policy led England to do nearly 40 years ago. It is a reproach, which we should hasten to remove, that our regard for the rights of labor and the welfare of our workingmen is not so great, nor our humanitarian standards so high as that of Great Britain.

FARMERS' ASSOCIATIONS.

The benefits of farmers' organizations designed to induce a larger production, better quality, cheaper transportation rates, better prices, and better market facilities are generally recognized. Trusts among the farmers or monopolies in farm products by the producers are impossible. Local cooperative association is perhaps the most effective means by which conditions in regard to the matters stated can be improved, and such improvement will result in benefit for the consumer as well as the producer. To restrain such associations would be absurd. To declare them unlawful would be the very height of folly. To allow them to remain subject to possible prosecution and their members liable to indictment as criminals is indefensible from every possible standpoint.

Discussing the fact that the farmer and producer does not receive a fair proportion of the price paid by the consumer the Secretary of Agriculture, in his last annual report, says:

It is clear that before the problems of marketing the individual farmer standing alone is helpless. Nothing less than concerted action will suffice. Cooperation is essential. * * * All the successful attempts in the marketing of any product anywhere in the world have come through organized effort. * * * The aim should be an economic arrangement which shall facilitate production, lead the producer to standardize and prepare his product for the market and to find the readiest and best market for his product. Such action will result in gain to the producer as well as to the consumer. Furthermore, it is desirable that such concerted action shall proceed from below upward. * * * Experience shows that the best results are secured only when the members of such a cooperative society are those who are bona fide producers.

Already is the wisdom and, indeed, the necessity of such cooperation becoming evident to the farmers. There are now established and in operation in the United States cooperative associations of creameries, 2,165; of cheese factories, 336; elevators, 2,020; besides many hundreds of fruit, cotton, tobacco, and other associations regarding which accurate statistics are not available. This is but the beginning of a movement which is bound to develop to immense magnitude as its necessity shall be understood and its merits recognized.

The food problem of a nation is ever a vital one. The high price of food products paid by the consumer and the small price received by the producer is becoming understood and is a condition that must be remedied. That one half of the price finally paid by the user of food products is absorbed by transportation and middlemen is a condition everyone must see ought not to exist. It is the concensus of opinion of those who have most carefully and dispassionately studied the question that the remedy lies in associated effort, in cooperative associations of the producers. As the Secretary of Agriculture says:

All successful atttempts in the marketing of any produce anywhere in the world have come through organized effort.

It is to protect such associations from assault by those who will profit by their absence that this provision is inserted in this bill. It is to prevent the possibility that efforts which are so manifestly for the benefit of all the people should be discredited and punished that we are now urging the adoption of the pending legislation.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am proud to say that I am and have been for a long time an active member of the International Typographical Union. And for a great many years it has occurred to me that it has been a mistake on the part of those in high places, while admitting that the differences between capital and labor constitute a great problem, to invariably put it up to labor itself to solve that problem—the knottiest one of all. Why should labor—tired with tedious hours and strenuous effort—be always asked to find for itself the solution?

This section 7 of this antitrust bill is a case in point. Not so long ago it was discovered that the Sherman antitrust law does what its framers did not intend it to do—that is, it catches by the throat and would throttle organized labor.

Thereupon organized labor must solve another problem. This section 7 of this new antitrust bill was written. Labor accepted the section. Then the discovery was made that section 7 would not serve the purpose—that it is like the hollow log lying under the wire fence through which the pig undertook to go from one field to another. The pig went through the hollow log all right, but the log was curved, and the pig landed right back in the same field. That is your section 7. Labor figured it out, and asked for the amendment which is now offered by Chairman WEBB, and which I support. My regret is that section 7 and the amendment are made a part of an antitrust bill which I fear can not stand up when it comes under the close criticism of another lawmaking body.

It is not a partisan question, as some have tried to make it appear here to-day. The flaw in section 7 was, I understand, pointed out by one of the Nation's leading Republicans. I am glad that organized labor accepted that tip.

Does anyone contend that the Sherman antitrust law ever was meant to prevent the organization of labor? Few—very few—make that declaration. Some men who unfortunately can not see that those who pay wages to labor need the upgrading, contract-making, legitimate American labor organizations, manned by leaders who would mean well to all labor—be it union or otherwise—would hang on to these decisions, and would gladly see skilled labor deprived of its right to organize.

Some who deal with labor consider the whole proposition with alarm. But they need not. On the one hand is labor, organized under competent leaders, willing to give a fair day's work for a fair day's pay; willing to make contracts and live up to them; willing to have peace—in fact, urging peace.

On the other hand, if you strike down organized labor, choke it to death, you will add to the ranks of those so-called revolutionists, who will not have peace, who are in the hands of agitators, who go from one strike into another, and who do not and can not help those who toil.

Let those who pay wages choose with whom they prefer to deal. I have heard the prediction made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. I will go a step further and predict that the time will come—let us hope that it is far distant—when the people of the United States will thank God they have organized and ready the American Federation of Labor, which lays the flag of the United States on its altar, which respects the rights of property, and which is eternally opposed to revolution; firmly opposed to direct action; an organization which helps workingmen instead of destroying them, and which stands against those aggregations which make contracts only to break them; against those organizations which teach "No God, no master"; against those un-American agitators who pledge men to disregard their oaths and urge them to perjure themselves whenever necessary, who advocate the destruction of property secretly, and who do all in their power to stop the wheels of progress. Oh, if these be dilemmas, which will you have? One is American, the other is not. One leads on to peace, the other leads to strife. Which will you have? [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the suggestion of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] with reference to the language incorporated in this bill by the Committee on the Judiciary. I think their intention by that language was to accomplish precisely what is being accomplished by the insertion of this amendment. Evidently it satisfied everybody for a while, with the exception of a few, and as a result of the objection raised by them this new amendment is proposed.

I must take exception to the remark of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] when he said this amendment was submitted to the Judiciary Committee and comes before the House approved by that committee. It was not submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary in any form that I ever heard or knew of, but is presented here as an amendment on the floor of the House.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that probably there is a new Judiciary Committee, and that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is the chairman of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky. It may be true. I regret exceedingly that this bill comes before this House involving three separate subjects of legislation. One is the regulation of business, another is the regulation of judicial procedure, and another is the regulation of labor and other organizations. If these matters were prepared and presented to us in separate bills, then they could receive their distinct support or opposition as men might feel toward them.

So far as the Webb amendment now proposed is concerned, it seems to me that it effectuates what the committee proposed in the original section 7, only in broader and clearer language. It provides that a certain class of organizations and their members shall not be held liable as conspiracies in restraint of trade or monopolies under the language of the antitrust law. As I understand it, it does not exempt them if they are guilty of aggressive, malicious, and criminal acts. If these are committed, then they are as much liable as any other class or set of citizens, and that is as it should be, for in matters of crime there ought to be no classification of the citizens of our country.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I proposed an inquiry to my colleague, Mr. HENRY, of Texas, when he was discussing this amendment, and I desire to now propound the same inquiry to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because I have a great deal of respect for his opinion concerning the legal constructions of this amendment. That is this: If cotton raisers should warehouse their cotton, a number of them, we will say 10,000 farmers, representing, say, a million bales of cotton, and determine that they would not sell until they got a certain price, would not that be a violation of this law?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will answer that directly, first, by saying that in my judgment it would, for the simple reason that that would be creating a corner in cotton, and a conspiracy to raise or depress the price of any commodity has been a crime in all the history of the Anglo-Saxon people. I will answer it in another way. The Webb amendment provides that certain organizations shall not be held to be conspiracies or organizations in restraint of trade, and that refers us back to the language of section 7 to ascertain what class of associations are covered by this exemption. When we refer to section 7 we read:

Associations instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Can not the gentleman have more time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield two minutes more for the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. These are the organizations that are intended to be exempt as organizations from the operations of these antitrust laws. I was very much impressed with the argument of my young friend, the Progressive in Pennsylvania, Mr. William Draper Lewis, the dean of our law school, when he said before the Judiciary Committee that the same law ought not to operate and regulate wares and merchandise and things that operated to regulate labor; and these bills ought to be divorced; the three portions ought to be divorced and separated from each other. For I am in this embarrassing position: I am going to vote to sustain the Webb amendment to this bill and incorporate it in the bill, and upon other grounds in which the bill is damaging and injurious to the business interests of this country I must vote against it as a whole. The Webb amendment will be adopted and the bill will be triumphantly passed in this House by the Democratic majority, so the absence of my vote on its final approval will not be missed, whereas I shall have expressed my willingness to exempt from the operations and effect of this statute the existence of these corporations but not any unlawful acts. [Applause.]

Mr. CARLIN. How much time has the gentleman from Minnesota consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 21 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Virginia 12 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this Webb amendment, because it does accomplish a purpose that there ought not to be any difference of opinion about. Whether it goes as far as it ought to is a question that we need not discuss now; and I wish just for a moment, Mr. Chairman, to give my opinion of what will be accomplished by the adoption of this amendment. In the first place, I must disagree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] that the original section 7 accomplished the same purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LENROOT. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I meant to say—and if I did not I did not express myself fully—that it was intended by the gentlemen of the committee to accomplish the same purpose. That was my understanding; that is all.

Mr. LENROOT. With that statement I have nothing further to say, but it is entirely clear to me that the original section accomplished absolutely nothing so far as the exemption of these organizations are concerned from prosecution under the antitrust laws; but with this amendment it does just this—that whatever opinion may be entertained as to the acts of individual members of these organizations, with this amendment adopted the organization itself can not be dissolved, the organization itself can not be pursued as having violated the law, and therefore it is a step forward regardless of the question of whether it goes far enough or not. But now, Mr. Chairman, I want to direct myself for just a moment to another proposition, a legal proposition, that runs all through section 7, and that is the use of the words "shall be construed," and so forth. It is most unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, that the committee has used this language.

It is of course within the province of this Congress to construe any act of its own; but, Mr. Chairman, it is not within the province of this Congress to attempt to construe any act of a previous Congress. But by this language it is attempted to construe all of the antitrust laws. Now, it is entirely clear to every lawyer that it is the province of the legislature to make the law and it is a judicial function to construe it. This Congress has no power to say to the court how it shall construe a law heretofore made; and the effect of all of it is, if the courts specifically uphold it, as I believe they will, they will entirely throw out of consideration the words "shall be construed" and say that it was the intention of Congress to change the law, as unquestionably it is. Now, this language has been criticized time after time by the courts. For instance, in a case in the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking of identical language, it said:

> But for the unfortunate and unnecessary use of the word "construed" in this sentence we apprehend that none of the resistance to this class of taxes now under consideration would have been thought of.

And all the way through the cases the courts have struggled to uphold the acts of Congress and legislatures, but only by saying that, while the legislature used the words "shall be construed," the real purpose was not to construe the law but to change it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied the courts will in interpreting this law say that the words "shall be construed" shall be thrown aside, and that it was the intention of this Congress to modify the existing antitrust laws; but this Congress has no power to modify the existing antitrust laws as to acts committed under them prior to the passage of this act; and if there is any idea that by using this language we are changing the law with respect to existing cases, we have no power to do it, and we have utterly failed.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I have always believed that the organization of labor is the only defense the workingman has against the inevitable tendency under the competitive system to reduce wages to the lowest point of subsistence. I therefore am in favor of legalizing and recognizing to the fullest extent these organizations; but it seems to me that the committee in proposing this legislation did not accomplish anything in that direction. If you will permit me to paraphrase this seventh section, it will read something like this:

> That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of a railroad company or a steamboat company or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof.

And adding the Webb amendment:

> Nor shall such organizations or members thereof be held to be unlawful combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade.

Of course a railroad company is not an unlawful combination, and of course a labor organization is not an illegal organization, and if that be true what does the section mean? It seems to me that there is a concealed purpose here to throw to the laboring men of the country something that means nothing; in fact, something that gives them nothing that they do not now have. Of course these organizations are not now illegal and in restraint of trade and conspiracies, and they never were. Take out of the section "labor organizations" and put in instead "railroad organizations," and nobody will pretend that under the antitrust laws the section would exempt the railroad organization from dissolution by the courts for violation of the antitrust law. How, then, can it be maintained that if the language of the section so paraphrased would make a railroad organization liable to dissolution that the section as it stands would not make a labor organization liable to dissolution?

But what you ought to do—and I suppose this is the real meat in the coconut—is to do something which will meet the real question. If members of such an organization commit an illegal act, that will be sufficient under the antitrust laws to warrant the dissolution of that organization.

Now, that, as I understand, is the real thing. Nobody, I suppose, wants to exempt people in this country from the consequences of illegal acts. Nobody asks Congress to do that. A railroad, a trust organization, if it commits illegal acts, may be dissolved by the courts; the whole institution may be dissolved. The purpose of the laboring man, as I understand it here, is that if they commit illegal acts, the court may go after the individual members responsible for the illegal acts; but the labor organization of which the lawbreakers may be members itself can not be dissolved. But the section under consideration does not do this at all, and I fear it does not give labor and farm organizations any real exemption.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is a question as to what is illegal. The gentleman has read the bill. Does he believe, under this bill, that in case of a strike, where the strikers assemble peaceably, remote from the place of the strike, an injunction would lie against them for peacefully assembling?

Mr. HULINGS. I do not think it ought to; and I think the power of injunction has been greatly abused by the courts, especially in labor disputes.

Mr. MURDOCK. It looks to me, under this bill, as if it will.

Mr. HULINGS. That would be a matter for the court when the act should be brought before it for adjudication. I fear the act itself is not clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] desire to use the remainder of his time now?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I would rather not. I have some little time left.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] is recognized.

[Mr. DICKINSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] is recognized.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am in hearty accord with the purpose sought to be obtained by the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I am in favor of exempting labor organizations, farm organizations, and fraternal organizations from the operations of the antitrust laws. I have never been able to understand the process of reasoning on the part of the courts of our country which has brought these organizations within the purview of the Sherman antitrust law. One has but to review the speeches made by Senator Sherman, author of the antitrust act; Senator Vest, of Missouri—than whom there were no greater—and many other noted lawyers and statesmen then serving in the Senate of the United States to see and to understand to a certainty that Congress had no thought of including these organizations within the operation of the law; but nevertheless, in some instances, the courts have construed the law to apply to these organizations, which has resulted in great harassment to the laboring people everywhere.

The laboring people, through their representatives, for many years have put up a gallant fight, insisting upon this law being construed as the lawmakers intended it to be and as common humanity and even-handed justice demand. The representatives of labor on the part of the farmers of this Nation and those representing the men who toil in the factories and toil in the mines, the men who produce the wealth of the Nation and who fight the battles of our country, have pressed upon Congress to write an exemption into the law which would indicate the intention of Congress to not bring these people within the operations of the antitrust act; but the party heretofore in power has at all times turned a deaf ear to these appeals and have failed and refused to do that which, it seems to me, to have been their plain duty to this great body of toilers. So finally the Democratic Party, in convention assembled at Baltimore in 1912, declared in favor of this exemption, and so it remains for this Congress, this Democratic Congress, to write into this antitrust legislation an exemption which will be so clearly and unmistakably put that none can be deceived by the language employed, that none of the organizations heretofore mentioned shall be affected by this antitrust legislation or the Sherman antitrust law. It is written in this amendment just as the people most affected by it asked that it be written. So that, Mr. Chairman, to-day by this piece of legislation we are crowning the efforts of the laboring people, covering many years, with the success that is only their just deserts; and I rejoice in this triumph, because it is not only for the good of these organizations mentioned in the amendment, but for the common good of all mankind.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the amendment to section 7, proposed and presented by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the chairman of the committee. I believe that it will add to the efficiency of the section and will carry out the desires of labor.

I understand that those organizations, those interested, have gone over the proposed amendment, and are satisfied with the amendment as it is now proposed by the committee instead of the proposed amendment that was presented by them and sent to each Congressman some days ago, where they proposed to amend section 7 by striking out certain language and using the words "shall not apply."

Gentlemen have discussed here the language "shall construe." You will find here that there is an additional word—"the court shall not hold" or will not be permitted to hold that these organizations are acting in restraint of trade.

Section 7, with the addition of the Webb amendment, will then read as follows:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations, orders, or associations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, orders, or associations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

The section as thus amended has been agreed upon and is satisfactory to the American Federation of Labor, the Farmers' National Organization, and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen of the United States. This will bring about the legislation that labor has been working for for over 25 years, and it now becomes the privilege of a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President to see that such legislation is enacted. The executive council of the American Federation of Labor has been actively and earnestly engaged in bringing about this legislation. In the American Federation of Labor Weekly News Letter, published at Washington, D. C., on Saturday, May 23, 1914, they have given a history of the legislation that is now being considered as contained in section 7 of this bill, which is as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR EXECUTIVE COUNCIL ACTS ON TRADE-UNION EXEMPTION CLAUSE.

WASHINGTON, May 23.

The American Federation of Labor executive council takes exception to the trade-union exemption clause of the Clayton antitrust bill which, it is claimed, is intended to cover those demands of organized labor embodied in the Bartlett-Bacon bills. At the council's session last week the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas the American Congress, in its wisdom, enacted a law on July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman antitrust law, which was intended by them to apply exclusively to large combinations of wealth—so-called trusts of property—for the avowed and specific purpose of preventing monopoly and exploitation of special privileges.

It was undoubtedly the intention of Congress to enact a law that would be effective in the prevention of huge combinations of wealth from crushing their competitors in the business world; it was also the avowed and openly expressed opinion of the statesmen who wrote that law that it should not apply to farmers' or laborers' organizations established for the betterment of producers of wealth.

The United States Senate, in Committee of the Whole, on March 26, 1890, while considering the Sherman bill, almost unanimously agreed to a provision exempting the organizations of working people from the proposed act.

On June 2, 1900, in the Fifty-sixth Congress, the House of Representatives, by a vote of 260 to 8, adopted a similar declaration in a supplementary amendment to the Sherman Act.

On June 2 and June 21, 1910, the House of Representatives again declared that the Sherman Act should not apply to the voluntary association of working people.

On February 20, 1913, in the Sixty-second Congress, the House of Representatives again made a similar declaration.

On February 28, 1913, the Senate accepted those provisions.

On March 4, 1913, after President Taft had vetoed the declaration, the House of Representatives, by a vote of 364 to 48, passed the bill over the veto of President Taft with the declarations intact.

On April 14, 1913, in the Sixty-third Congress, the House of Representatives, by a vote of 198 to 47, again declared itself in favor of the above-stated declarations.

On May 7, 1913, the United States Senate, by a vote of 41 to 32, agreed to the House declaration, and on June 23, 1913, President Woodrow Wilson signed the sundry civil appropriation bill, approving the Hamill-Roddenbery provisos exempting labor and farmers' organizations from the antitrust appropriation section of that act.

At the Denver convention of the Democratic Party in 1908, and at the Baltimore convention of the Democratic Party in 1912, emphatic declarations were unanimously adopted by those conventions pledging the Democratic Party, if elected to power, to enact legislation so that the organizations of labor and producers "should not be regarded as illegal combinations in restraint of trade."

Hon. Woodrow Wilson, the candidate for the Presidency, in his speech of acceptance, emphatically pledged himself to support that specific plank in the platform of his party.

The above historical facts can neither be disputed nor denied; and

Whereas the antitrust bill, H. R. 15657, now being considered by the House of Representatives, is the administration measure and is intended to cover supplementary trust legislation, with the avowed purpose to meet the Democratic platform declarations in reference to its labor planks.

I here insert an article from Organized Labor in its issue of May 23, 1914. Speaking upon this question, the following pertinent and applicable language is used:

[From Organized Labor, Saturday, May 23, 1914.]

LABOR'S POSITION ON THE ANTITRUST LAW.

President Wilson is said to be in favor of subjecting trades-unions to the provisions of the Sherman law against combination in restraint of trade. It is proposed that the unions shall not be subject to injunction for such action as may restrain trade. A strike or a boycott may be punished just as the organization of a trust in business. This proposal is supported by the contention that the law should bear upon all people alike, upon the labor striker as upon the engrosser and forestaller of commodities or the railroad combiner. To exempt the unions would be, it is said, to grant them a special privilege. All of which sounds and looks good; but is it?

A labor union has no special privilege bestowed by the State. It hasn't even a charter. Corporations have advantages as such. They are creatures of the State and subject to regulation. Labor unions are not formed to make profits. They are formed to prevent the lowering of wages even more than to further the raising of wages. That the unions seek a labor monopoly in retraint of trade is not true. Their end is not a monopoly of work, but proper pay for the work the workers perform. And it must not be forgotten that back of the labor union is the laboring man. That man has a right to himself. He has a right to work or not work, as he pleases, and if he withholds his work he is not restraining anybody's trade or commerce. If he prevents another man from working, that is something more than an offense against the Sherman Act, if it is anything. He can be punished for it as a crime or misdemeanor under other laws, but he should not be punished by penalties for ignoring injunctions ex parte. The contention of union-labor leaders that unions should be exempt from the operation of the injunction provisions of the Sherman Act is a sound one, says Reedy's Mirror. It is a contention based upon the workingman's right to his own labor. The inclusion of labor unions under the new act is not necessary. If they violate that law, they usually lay themselves open to prosecution for more serious violations of law.

Clearly the Sherman antitrust law was not meant to apply to combinations of labor. That law was and is directed against combinations of corporations. There is no question of equality under that law as between privileged corporations and united workers. Surely no sane person wants the Sherman Act used to force a man to work for some one he doesn't want to work for. That's what the application of the Sherman Act to union labor would amount to. Union labor hasn't anything belonging to all the people entitling the Government to regulate it beyond compelling it to keep the peace. But the big corporations have governmental privileges, special favors, and Government rightly regulates them. A labor organization that might be subject to action under the proposed law would be subject to more drastic action for grosser offenses first. And this consideration alone makes it plain that the Sherman Act was never intended to apply to union labor. The exemption of organized labor would be no privilege at all. What labor organization aims at and what combinations and trusts aim at are entirely different things. The one seeks only to see that the laborer gets his proper hire. The other seeks to gough labor of its share of what it produces. The President should favor the labor exemption, because if he does not the Sherman Act will be made the means to prevent the workingman from bettering his pay or the conditions under which he shall earn that pay.

In speaking upon this same subject the following appears in the American Federation of Labor, published at Washington, D. C., in its issue of Saturday, May 30, 1914:

VICTORY IS IN SIGHT—LABOR TO BE FREED FROM ANTITRUST LAWS, INJUNCTION ABUSE, AND UNJUST CONTEMPTS.

WASHINGTON, May 28.

The parliamentary situation of the Clayton antitrust bill in Congress, in which labor is vitally affected, has reached a satisfactory stage. For years the American Federation of Labor contended that the Sherman antitrust law was never intended to apply and should not have been applied to the voluntary organizations of the working people. By reason of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Hatters' case, and of several courts in other cases, that law was made to apply to organizations of workers. It is unnecessary at this time to recount the various phases and developments of the efforts to secure remedial legislation which the working people of the country have so long and so justly demanded. There was an apparent disposition on the part of those in control of legislation to enact a bill adequate to meet the needs of the working people. But upon close study and scrutiny the representatives of the American Federation of Labor soon learned that the labor sections of the tentative drafts of the Clayton antitrust bill were ineffective, and insisted upon changes to conform to declarations of the Democratic and the Progressive Parties. For a time it appeared that divergent opinions would result in a permanent cleavage. Representatives of the American Federation of Labor insisted upon good faith being observed. After many changes the representatives of all parties and the American Federation of Labor reached a general agreement. The American Federation of Labor has had the hearty cooperation of the labor group in Congress and the representatives of the railroad brotherhoods and of the farmers' organizations.

In the Clayton bill dealing with supplementary legislation on the Sherman antitrust law is incorporated the following agreed-upon section:

"SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations instituted for the purposes of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations, orders, or associations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof, nor shall such organizations, orders, or associations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws."

There are other sections of the Clayton bill which deal with the regulation and limitation of the issuance of injunctions. There are sections dealing with the subject of the regulation of contempt proceedings and providing for jury trials in alleged indirect contempts. The section dealing with injunctions, in which labor is primarily interested, is as follows:

"SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employee, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

"And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working, or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peacefully assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes, or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in absence of such dispute by any party thereto, nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful."

The sections dealing with the contempt proceedings and jury trials are as follows:

"SEC. 19. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia by doing any act or thing therein, or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 20. That whenever it shall be made to appear to any district court or judge thereof, or to any judge therein sitting, by the return of a proper officer on lawful process, or upon the affidavit of some credible person, or by information filed by any district attorney that there is reasonable ground to believe that any person has been guilty of such contempt, the court or judge thereof, or any judge therein sitting, may issue a rule requiring the said person so charged to show cause upon a day certain why he should not be punished therefor, which rule, together with a copy of the affidavit or information, shall be served upon the person charged with sufficient promptness to enable him to prepare for and make return to the order at the time fixed therein. If upon or by such return, in the judgment of the court, the alleged contempt be not sufficiently purged, a trial shall be directed at a time and placed fixed by the court: Provided, however, That if the accused, being a natural person, fail or refuse to make return to the rule to show cause, an attachment may issue against his person to compel an answer, and in case of his continued failure or refusal, or if for any reason it be impracticable to dispose of the matter on the return day, he may be required to give reasonable bail for his attendance at the trial and his submission to the final judgment of the court. Where the accused person is a body corporate, an attachment for the sequestration of its property may be issued upon like refusal or failure to answer.

"In all cases within the purview of this act such trial may be by the court or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury, in which latter event the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance or the court or the judge thereof in chambers may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be selected and summoned, as provided by law, to attend at the time and place of trial, at which time a jury shall be selected and impaneled as upon a trial for misdemeanor, and such trial shall conform as near as may be to the practice in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or upon information.

"If the accused be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly, prescribing the punishment either by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court. Such fine shall be paid to the United States or to the complainant or other party injured by the act constituting the contempt or may, where more than one is so damaged, be divided or apportioned among them as the court may direct, but in no case shall the fine to be paid to the United States exceed, in case the accused is a natural person, the sum of $1,000, nor shall such imprisonment exceed the term of six months.

"SEC. 21. That the evidence taken upon the trial of any person so accused may be preserved by bill of exceptions, and any judgment of conviction may be reviewed upon writ of error in all respects as now provided by law in criminal cases, and may be affirmed, reversed, or modified as justice may require. Upon the granting of such writ of error execution of judgment shall be stayed and the accused, if thereby sentenced to imprisonment, shall be admitted to bail in such reasonable sum as may be required by the court or by any justice or any judge of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 22. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto, as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States, but the same and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 19 of this act may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

"SEC. 23. That no proceeding for contempt shall be instituted against any person unless begun within one year from the date of the act complained of; nor shall any such proceeding be a bar to any criminal prosecution for the same act or acts; but nothing herein contained shall affect any proceedings in contempt pending at the time of the passage of this act."

It is confidently predicted, justified by the parliamentary situation, that the bill, with the above sections, will be passed by the House within the next few days.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, for a number of years there has been much discussion and agitation in this country on the subject of trusts and monopolies. In 1890 Congress passed what is known as the Sherman antitrust law in an effort to curb, prevent, or restrain unlawful combinations in restraint of trade and insure lawful and wholesome competition in the commerce of the United States. Notwithstanding that law has been in force for 24 years, combinations, trusts, and monopolies have increased at a marvelous rate and have grown so enormous in size as almost to stagger with bewilderment and confusion the mind that undertakes to contemplate or unravel them. So successful have these great combinations of wealth been in the past, not only in their organization but also in their operation, that we are now compelled to buy much that we buy from a trust, and to sell to a trust much that we have to sell. This condition in the past has enabled the trust and monopoly to fix the price of the thing it bought from us and the thing it sold to us, the result being that the real producer and the real consumer have both been at the mercy of these great aggregations of wealth.

It would be interesting, if time permitted, to go somewhat into detail in undertaking to show the methods these corporations have adopted and practiced in stifling competition and controlling the markets of trade. But this is a familiar story. We have seen them force out of the market independent concerns by the most destructive and unfair methods and practices. We have seen them, by threats and by intimidation, force a competitor to sell out to them or be financially ruined. We have seen them go into communities and in order to drive out a legitimate competitor reduce the price of their own article below the cost of production, and then, after the competitor had gone to the wall or sold out his business, the trust would raise the price of its own article far above the cost of production and a reasonable profit. Why could it do this? Because, after driving its competitor out of business, it had control of the field. Who paid in the end for this method of transacting business? The consumer, who was compelled to buy from them, because there was no one else left from whom to purchase.

This method of big business has been very largely practiced in the manufacturing industry. It was this method which enabled great corporations like the Standard Oil Co., the American Tobacco Co., the International Harvester Co., and many others of like size and purpose to obtain absolute control of the manufacture and sale of the commodities which they manufactured and sold.

This condition has been recognized by all parties in the United States for the past 15 or 20 years. Real competition in trade has been gradually growing less and less as monopoly has increased. Notwithstanding there has been an insistent and persistent demand from the people of every class and creed for relief from these burdensome conditions, no administration and no party has made any honest effort to correct these manifest evils until the Democratic Party came into power on March 4, 1913. It is true the Republican administration "prosecuted" a few corporations, and possibly "fined" the "corporation"; and it is true that they "dissolved" the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. But the small fines assessed against the corporation as such resulted in no real benefit to the people, and the dissolution of the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. was soon followed by a rise in the value of their shares of stock, which greatly enriched their owners without corresponding benefit to the people. No officer of either company was ever prosecuted.

In the campaign of 1912 the Democratic Party, at its convention at Baltimore, adopted the following plank in its platform, upon which it went before the people and asked their votes:

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including among others the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directors, of stock watering, of discrimination in price, and the control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions.

We condemn the action of the Republican administration in compromising with the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust and its failure to invoke the criminal provisions of the antitrust law against the officers of those corporations after the court had declared that from the undisputed facts in the record they had violated the criminal provisions of the law.

We regret that the Sherman antitrust law has received a judicial construction depriving it of much of its efficacy, and we favor the enactment of legislation which will restore to the statute the strength of which it has been deprived by such interpretation.

There is, Mr. Speaker, no evasion or equivocation about the language of that platform. There is nothing in it that the simplest mind can not understand. It demands the enforcement of the criminal laws against those who have violated the antitrust laws, and it demands the enactment of further laws prescribing the conditions upon which corporations may engage in trade between the States, among them being the prevention of holding companies, interlocking directors, unfair discrimination in price, and the control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any given industry as practically to wipe out competition.

We, the Democratic Party and the Democratic administration, are now engaged in undertaking to enact a law in compliance with the pledges of that platform. We are seeking at this time to do what no other party has attempted to do, either for lack of courage or intelligence, namely, to write into the statute laws of the United States provisions designed to protect legitimate business against the unfair methods of monopoly and to protect the people themselves against the encroachments of those who in the past have sought to hinder and obstruct the freedom of competition in everything necessary to the prosperity and happiness of the people.

The provisions of the bill now under consideration are intended to prevent unfair discrimination, in so far as that end may be accomplished by legislation. Section 2 of the bill is designed to correct a widespread and common unfair trade practice whereby certain great corporations have heretofore endeavored to destroy competition and render unprofitable the business of competitors by selling their goods and merchandise at a lower price in the community of their rivals than at other places throughout the country, hoping that after the rival in business had been driven from the field the corporation would then enhance the price sufficiently to regain the loss made necessary in driving out the competitor. This section expressly forbids such practices when intended to injure or destroy the business of a competitor. This bill is not designed nor intended to prevent the lowering of prices in a legitimate way, for we are all interested in seeing that the cost of those things which are necessary to human progress and happiness shall not be above their reasonable value. But our experience in the past has demonstrated the fact that when a great corporation which has or is seeking a monopoly of the products of human labor goes into the field and by its unfair methods drives out a competitor in business, the people have usually been compelled to pay increased prices for the article controlled by such corporation after it has obtained a monopoly and driven out competition. It is an old axiom that competition is the life of trade, and the measure now before the House is designed to restore as far as possible healthy competition, so that the people may receive the benefit of the natural flow of trade in every legitimate channel.

The necessity for such legislation is shown by the fact that within the last few years 19 States of this Union have enacted laws forbidding such unfair discrimination and unfair practices, and it is important that Congress should supplement these State laws with similar legislation, as Congress alone has the power to regulate interstate commerce and the conditions upon which it may be engaged in.

In like manner, section 3 of the bill is intended to prevent owners or operators of mines, oil or gas wells, or other mineral products to refuse arbitrarily to sell his product, or any part of it, to a responsible purchaser. It is now recognized that the great mineral deposits which God has placed in the earth were placed there for the benefit of mankind. The coal, the oil, the gas, the copper, the gold and silver, the iron and steel, and other forms of mineral wealth are absolutely indispensable to human development and comfort in these modern days. In the past it has frequently happened that legitimate enterprises have been made to suffer because the coal barons and the oil kings refused to sell to them the necessary coal or the necessary oil with which to carry on their business. Such refusal has sometimes resulted in the closing of manufacturing plants and the throwing out of employment of men, simply because the owner of the coal or of the oil or other product of the mine practiced favoritism and discrimination as between purchasers, with the intention of building up one concern and destroying the other. Recognizing that these great natural sources of mineral wealth belong in truth to all the people and were created for all the people, it is sought in this measure to prevent their monopolization for the benefit of a few and to the injury of the great masses of those who depend upon them for the comforts and necessities of life.

Section 4 of the bill is designed to prevent what is known as "tying contracts." A great manufacturing company will go into a community and make a contract to let one certain person, firm, or corporation handle its products, provided such person, firm, or corporation will agree not to handle the goods of any other manufacturer who is a competitor. The very essence of such a transaction is monopoly. The local concern is not always nor usually to blame, because it desires to handle the particular articles in question, and perhaps it would like to handle similar articles manufactured by other concerns. But he frequently can not obtain the articles made by one manufacturer without agreeing not to handle the competitive articles made by another manufacturer, and so a monopoly of the given articles is created and an unlawful and unwholesome restraint of trade is the result, and the people are frequently unable to obtain the benefits of competition because the manufacturer ties the local merchant with a contract not to sell the products of a like or similar character made by a competing manufacturer. This bill will not prevent a manufacturer from selecting his customer or from making one person, firm, or corporation in any community his sole agent for the distribution of his products, because such a provision would be impracticable and perhaps work injury to legitimate business. But while it is true that he can designate a given concern to whom he will sell the products of his factory, he can not compel that concern to agree not to handle also the products of other manufacturers if he wants to do it. The merchant is not required to handle the products of others, unless he wants to do it. But this bill is intended to give the local merchant the right to handle as many competitive articles of the same kind as he may wish to handle, without tying his hands to one and only one concern under penalty of being refused or denied the right to handle such concern's products. The object and intention of this section of the bill is to create and sustain competition in trade and give the people the right of choice as to what articles of merchandise they will use.

Suppose, for instance, a manufacturer of plows should go to a local merchant in some agricultural community and propose to allow the merchant to handle his particular brand of plows Or suppose the merchant himself should seek the handling of those plows in that community. The manufacturer might say, "I will let you handle my plows, provided you agree not to handle the plows made by any other concern." But the merchant would say in reply, "Many people in my community use other brands of plows, and I would like to handle other plows, so that I can furnish them to those who may desire them." The manufacturer, under the present law, would have the right to say, "You can not handle my plows unless you agree not to handle any other plow on the market." The result would be that the merchant would have to agree to that or be denied the right to handle the plows in question. In that event the merchant suffers because he is in the power of the trust or monopoly of a given brand of plows, and the community suffers because of a lack of competition and because of a frequent inability to secure the article they desire. All such conditions operate to restrain the freedom of trade and to build up monopoly at the expense of the people. It is hoped that this provision of the pending bill will go far to relieve trade of such handicaps and to restore and maintain the proper sort of competition.

Other sections of the bill forbid one corporation from acquiring the stock or shares of another corporation where the effect of such acquisition and control would be to eliminate or substantially lessen competition. This provision is intended to prevent what is commonly known as "holding companies." A "holding company" is a company that holds the stock of another company or companies, and one whose primary object is to "hold" the stock of other companies, which is a common and favorite method of promoting monopoly.

Under this method one corporation may buy up all the stock of several competing corporations engaged in commerce, or enough of their stock to give the "holding company" control of them all, and thereafter all the different corporations whose stock has been thus bought up are under the same control and are operated as though it were one concern. As thus defined, a "holding company" is created for the sole purpose of fostering monopoly and stifling competition, and is simply an incorporated likeness of the old-fashioned trust. For instance, a great corporation located in the city of New York or Chicago, under that system, might purchase the stock of 25 or 50 different smaller corporations in different States engaged in manufacturing similar and competitive products. These smaller corporations would remain separate corporations as organized under the laws of the different States, but their stock would be owned and they would be controlled by the corporation in New York or Chicago which owned their stock; and whereas previously they had all been competitors in the markets of the world, they would now, for all practical purposes, operate as parts of one great "holding" corporation, and competition would be at an end. This measure is designed to prevent that, where the primary purpose or the necessary consequence is to destroy or substantially lessen competition in trade.

Another great evil in the conduct of business, which is denounced by the Democratic platform, is what is commonly called "interlocking directors." By this term we mean the condition where the same men are directors and officers of many different corporations, some of them supposedly competitors, but all of them actuated by a community of interest which in many instances in the past has resulted in disaster. Recently one man in New York resigned from the board of directors of 50 different corporations. His published reason for so doing was that he recognized the changed condition of public sentiment regarding this manifest evil, and desired to adjust himself to the new ideals now permeating the business world. Whether this action was brought about by the dictates of conscience or the exercise of a prudent foresight we need not now stop to inquire.

The same conditions exist with reference to many others who have not yet adjusted themselves to the new conditions and demands of modern business thought, but who are as intricately "interlocked" in the boards of directors of naturally competing corporations as was he to whom I have just referred. There can be no real competition between companies engaged in commerce where the same persons control the policy of the different companies. It would be contrary to the weakness of human nature if they did not manipulate all of such companies for their selfish ends regardless of the interests of the public. Many examples could be called to mind where the directors of railroads, banks, coal companies, steamship companies, and various manufacturing concerns have been and are now so linked and "interlocked" that there is no competition in management and therefore none in operation. The whole design of the bill now under discussion in so far as it affects business is to secure and maintain fair and free competition among concerns and products naturally competitive, and therefore, in accordance with the declaration of our platform, it is provided in this measure that such conditions are to be remedied in so far as legislation may make this possible and practicable.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to discuss briefly at this point the provisions of this bill which affect the rights of labor and of those who labor.

In searching the sacred pages of the Holy Scriptures for inspiration and guidance through this earthly journey we call life we find nowhere a command that we shall form a monopoly or that we shall become vastly rich or that we shall oppress our fellowman. Nowhere within the covers of that wonderful book are we admonished to "toil not, nor spin." But we are commanded to labor. Out of the voiceless silence of the ages past comes the command that "in the sweat of our faces" shall we eat bread. Thus in this, as in many other passages of the Bible, labor is not only sanctioned, but is sanctified; and we read each time with renewed consolation the invitation of the Son of man to "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more ennobling than honest toil, and none more noble than the honest toiler. In every age, in every clime, in every condition of human progress, he has borne more than his share of the burdens of the fight. In every battle for human liberty he has been in the forefront, willing to give his life, if necessary, that others might have life and have it more abundantly. When home and country have been in need of defense, he has harkened to the voice of duty and gone forth from those he loved to return no more. In religion, in patriotism, in service to humanity, in the drudging hardships of camp and quarry, of field and factory, the man who works and the woman who works have contributed more to the welfare of the world than all the hosts combined whose claim to our remembrance is bolstered chiefly through the "boasts of heraldry or the pomp of power." And some day, somewhere, I hope to see erected to those who toil and have toiled, or shall ever toil, a monument more beautiful, more imposing, and more lasting than any that has been erected in the name of cruel war or selfish greed. [Applause.]

Imbued deeply with the sentiments I have sought feebly to express, it is not strange that I place myself upon the side of those who favor the amendment to this bill, which exempts labor organizations and farmers' organizations from the operation of the antitrust law.

In support of that amendment, I submit that it was never the intention of Congress to apply the antitrust laws to such organizations, and if they had intended it such intention would have been wrong. The object in view in passing the antitrust laws was to strike at and destroy an evil, to curb monopoly, and punish combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade. No one will contend, in the light of history, that labor unions or farmers' organizations are an evil; but, on the contrary, they have been greatly beneficial to those who labor in factory, field, or shop, and the blessings flowing therefrom have been shared by many indirectly who were not members of such organizations.

The offense denounced by the Sherman antitrust law is that of combining or conspiring in restraint of trade. Can it be said that an organization of men who work with their hands, who have organized for mutual help, for improving the conditions of labor, or advancing the wages which they receive is a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade? Manifestly such an interpretation of the law would be an injustice to labor. Can it be said that an organization of farmers, who have organized for mutual protection and in order to insure an adequate price for the products which they have dug from the soil, is an illegal combination in restraint of trade? Such a construction of the law would be unjust and unwarranted. The great trusts and monopolies are offensive organizations. They are organized for profit and exploitation. Laboring men and farmers have been compelled to organize in self-defense in order to protect themselves against the rapacity of those whose acts are denounced by the Sherman antitrust law.

So that we may in truth say that this amendment exempting such organizations from the operation of the antitrust law gives to labor and to agriculture what it asks and is entitled to. It recognizes the difference between the man whose only asset is his power to work and the man who seeks to use labor and the products of labor for monopolistic purposes. It recognizes the self-evident truth that all real wealth in the final analysis is produced by those who toil, and that therefore the man who toils and eats his bread in the sweat of his brow has a moral and legal right to cooperate with others of his fellow men in the same condition for the purpose of mutual help, protection, and improvement not only of the conditions of labor, but for the advancement of the compensation which he receives therefor.

This principle was recognized in the Democratic platforms of 1908 and 1912, when a plank was incorporated therein advocating the thing we are now about to write into this law. It is gratifying to be able at this time, when the Democratic Party is engaged in writing into the statutes new laws for the reestablishment of legitimate conditions of business, to place in the law a provision giving to labor a legal status. And as business under the provisions of this bill will be eventually liberated from the unwholesome conditions which have crippled and shackled it in the past, so will the man who with his hands makes business and prosperity possible receive that share of legal recognition to which he is entitled. And I hope and believe that the provision under discussion will be overwhelmingly adopted. [Applause.]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention briefly to the great work which has been accomplished by the present Democratic administration in carrying out the platform pledges and enacting laws for the benefit of the whole people of the United States.

On the 4th day of March, 1913, the Democrats obtained control of every branch of the National Government. President Woodrow Wilson came into office as the first Democratic President in 16 years, having behind him the loyal support of a Democratic Senate and House of Representatives. He called Congress into extraordinary session on April 7, 1913, and since that date it has been in continuous session. During that length of time it has revised the tariff downward, in accordance with the mandate of the people and the doctrines of the Democratic Party. Our party has always advanced and fought for the principle that the taxing power of the Government should not be used except for the collection of public revenue sufficient to carry on the Government economically administered, and that it ought not to be exercised to enrich a few at the expense of the masses. The Democratic tariff of 1913 recognized that principle in every detail.

During the period since the Democratic Party came into power it has placed upon the statutes an income tax, which has been demanded by the American people for nearly a generation. Under this law the swollen wealth of the country will contribute its just proportion toward the expenses of Government, whereas heretofore it has enjoyed the benefits of this Government without contributing to its support in proportion to the benefits received and the ability to pay. The Democratic Party has for many years, in and out of season, without ceasing, and without shadow of turning, advocated the passage of an income-tax law, and we are now able to see the result of its efforts crystallized into a law which all men now recognize as just and equitable.

During that period the Democratic administration has passed a law reforming and reorganizing the banking and currency laws of the United States, a task which had been ignored by the Republican Party for 50 years. The passage of that law meant the death knell of the Money Trust; the impossibility of Nation-wide financial panics; makes it impossible for a few high financiers to concentrate the money of this country in Wall Street; extends a strong, helping hand to the farmer, while fully protecting the interests of the business man and the banker; provides for the establishment of foreign branches to take care of our foreign commerce; provides for the issuance of elastic currency, which will meet the demands of trade in every season and in every part of the United States; and takes from the hands of a few money manipulators the power to control the financial policy of this Government and places it with the people through their constituted authorities, where it ought to be. When this new system has been fully organized and put in operation it is the belief of all classes of our people that it will prove itself to be one of the greatest pieces of constructive legislation ever enacted by Congress.

In addition to these things, the administration of President Wilson has been instrumental in eliminating from Washington a lobby which in former times has exercised a baneful influence upon legislation. It has secured the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act which gave to a shipping monopoly a subsidy of nearly $2,000,000 per annum out of the pockets of the people. It has caused to be signed treaties with more than half the nations of the world providing for the arbitration of international disputes, thus hastening the day when peace may dwell among the peoples of the world and the staggering expenditures for war and its horrors may be greatly reduced.

It has passed the industrial employees' arbitration act, providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between employers and employees.

It has developed and extended the Parcel Post System to a high degree of perfection, resulting in a reduction of rates and an increase in the size of packages, making home life for the city man and for the farmer easier and cheaper.

It has inaugurated in the Department of Agriculture a system of markets whereby scientific and modern business methods will be applied toward the elimination of waste in transporting and distributing farm products.

It has passed the Lever bill providing for farm-extension work, which is designed to increase greatly the productiveness of American farms and thereby add to the general wealth of the Nation. It is intended to carry directly to the farm all the scientific discoveries of the Department of Agriculture and the State agricultural colleges. When it is remembered that during last year the farmers of the United States created nine billions of wealth, the importance of the passage of such a bill can be easily understood.

It has passed through the House of Representatives and hopes to pass through the Senate a bill granting Government aid to the different States and their subdivisions for the construction and maintenance of good roads, thus making more easy the transportation of farm products and adding to the prosperity and happiness of the people.

Many other important matters of legislation and administration for the benefit of the people have been inaugurated, to which I can not call attention for lack of time. And now Congress is engaged in the passage of these bills to supplement the antitrust laws, to prevent overcapitalization of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, to curb and restrain and, as far as possible, destroy monopoly and restore honest and practical competition in trade. And in addition to this it has under course of preparation bills for the establishment of a practical and effective system of rural credits, which will afford to those engaged in farming facilities for obtaining credit on long time and at lower rates of interest than are at present available, which we hope to enact into law in the near future, and which we hope will result in permanent good to those who need credit, that they may establish homes and finance their agricultural enterprises with greater chances of success than is possible under conditions as they exist at present. [Applause.]

Such a record, Mr. Speaker, is sufficient to cause any party or any administration to feel that its labors have not been in vain. Such a record is sufficient to demonstrate to the country that the Democratic Party knows how to serve the people, and that it has the courage and the intelligence to go forward instead of backward; that it has the patience to tire not in well-doing; and that it has the foresight to strive for the accomplishment of those things which shall in the end make for industrial peace at home and international peace abroad, and set a new mark in the advancement of the ages which shall reflect honor upon our efforts and glory upon our flag. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] is recognized.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, there is no economic problem which engages the attention of the people so much as the trust or monopoly evil. The iron hand of monopoly is felt by every person in the United States, and indeed by the people throughout the world. It is well that the public mind is aroused, because failure to check the growth of monopolies and failure to prevent the ravages of those already in existence will result in industrial slavery.

What is a monopoly and what is its source of power to oppress? It is created by welding together all of the industries which produce any article and placing this combination under one control. There is then no one to offer at a lower price articles similar to those produced by the monopoly. In other words there is no competition. The monopolist can then demand and receive all the public can and will pay rather than be without the article in question. The monopoly being the only employer of the kind of labor required in the production of the article which it alone produces, can and does say what such labor will be paid as wages. The customer must pay what the monopoly or trust demands for its product, or do without, as no other can offer the same for sale. The workman skilled only in making the thing sold by the monopoly must accept the wages it offers or do without and try to learn some other business.

It does not require much thought to enable any man to understand the danger to free men from the tryannical power which monopolies can wield. Every earnest man who thinks for a moment of others agrees that something should be done to limit the power if not destroy monopolies. As a remedy we have now before this House a measure called "A bill to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies." I intend to vote for this bill, for while I do not believe that we shall get complete relief from it, I am ready and anxious to support any measure which will do something toward breaking the power of monopoly. But will this proposed law accomplish the desired result? I am anxious that it should strip monopoly of its power, and yet I can only feel that it will do much better in the way of regulation than the present law.

I believe that this bill is the most perfect development thus far of the plan to solve the problem of monopoly by control and regulation. But the job of controlling and regulating a monopoly is much the same as if you were to give a man your farm and then try to order when he should plow, where he should sow, at what price he should sell his crops, and to say that he should not talk to his neighboring farmer across the fence about the price of what they have to sell. You lost the right and power to control effectively when you gave away the farm, and so the people of the country are unable to control and regulate monopolies because they have given them the natural resources of the country. It makes little difference whether the grant was originally made to one person or to a number of persons. The true remedy and, in fact, the only real cure for the evils of monopoly is to restore to the public as far as possible these natural resources. If a tax sufficient to absorb economic rent were levied upon the real value of oil land, coal land, ore land, and other sources of raw material, we would find the strangle hold of monopoly soon loosened. No man or men could then afford to withhold from use the natural resources which they have gotten into their possession. In order to pay such a tax they would be compelled to make use of the land or resources under their control; and if they should do this, they would turn out their products in such quantities as to make it necessary to sell at a reasonable price in order to dispose of their output. The customers would then be able to buy the products more freely. Labor would receive higher wages, because of the increased demand for labor resulting from the using of resources heretofore held out of use by monopoly. Of course increased demand for anything, including labor, means that more must be paid to get it. Why have we not applied this simple remedy? Why do we give the earth to a few and then try to regulate them?

The explanation, it seems to me, is that men's minds usually accept, as an explanation for any difficulty, the cause which is most apparent and nearest to the trouble. So when we see a few men getting immense fortunes in a very short time, we begin to blame the men and try to regulate their actions. Restore to the people their rights in the natural resources of the country and the trust question will solve itself. This, as I have already suggested, can be done by taxation. But, answer some, this would not be fair to those who have paid for these privileges in the natural resources. Let me call your attention to the fact that the taxing of such resources at a rate about equal to its natural rent would simply prevent the monopoly from playing the dog-in-the-manger game of withholding the natural resources from use, but would still leave them the title and possession and a reasonable profit if they will but use them. The profit which has come to monopoly merely from the privilege of controlling the natural resources would of course be much reduced under the plan which I have suggested, but you who support the pending bill can not offer that as an objection to the plan. The very purpose of the bill before this House is to prevent the trusts or monopolies from getting an unfair profit. The plan of the bill reported by the committee is to leave the trusts in possession of their special privileges in the natural resources, but to tell them how to sell their product and to whom they must sell it, so that they will be fairer to the people. But if by taxation we compel the holders of the natural resources to use them or to let others use them, the natural law of supply and demand will reduce prices and raise wages, and this would mean prosperity for all.

There has been a great deal said during the debate on this bill about the proposal that labor unions shall not be subject to the terms of the antitrust law. We have observed the tearful anxiety of those who shudder at the very thought of class legislation when it appears to favor the cause of labor. Keeping in mind the purpose of this bill, does the so-called exception in favor of labor constitute class legislation? I claim that it does not.

The evil that the bill is intended to correct is the monopoly of the natural resources—to prevent a few persons from getting control of such portions of the earth as contain the raw material or means of production of the necessities and comforts of life. We have a natural and moral right to prevent a monopoly of the earth, the storehouse provided by God for the human family. We have a right and duty to destroy special privilege in the earth which was provided by the Creator, not for one or a few but for all His people. To permit anything else, to permit one or a few to own and absolutely control the earth, is to put the rest of mankind at the mercy of these few, because they can only live and labor on the terms made by the few.

But no man has any natural or moral right of ownership in another man's body or his power to labor, and therefore no man has any right to say that another shall or shall not work or to say that he shall not consult with his fellows about working or refusing to work or in regard to the terms of employment so long as the conference is free from violence. The same right as to his labor, whether manual or mental, must be conceded to the individual employer or if a corporation be the employer, then the officials of such corporation have the right to consult with one another or with like officials of some or all other corporations in regard to the terms upon which they will do their work. This, however, is an entirely different thing from permitting a monopoly of the resources of the earth.

It is the old, old story of the struggle of the millions of human beings for the fruits of their toil, on the one hand, and by the holders of special privileges for the fruits of other men's toil on the other hand. And yet, all this is permitted in the name of justice. Millions of men and women toil wearily from day to day and drag out only a miserable existence. Countless children are without food enough to fully nourish them, and know not how to laugh. Mr. Chairman, we can not much longer tolerate such conditions. We must soon stop trying the time-worn plan of permitting a few men to monopolize the earth, and then trying to compel them by law to be kind enough to give others their just share of its fruits. We must go to the root of the evil. We must remove the cause by abolishing special privilege itself.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] is recognized.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I can not hope to say much within the time allotted me. I will say, however, that I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee to section 7 of the bill. I do not believe that it would be right to place labor organizations, farmers' organizations, and fraternal organizations in the same category with organizations formed for the express and sole purpose of making money. One organizes for the purpose of uplifting humanity, the other for the purpose of exploiting humanity.

The present method of business is to put the brawn and muscles of human beings in one end of the scale and dollars in the other end and weigh it out, just as the grocer weighs out his sugar to a customer. This is revolting to any man who loves his fellow man. Involved on one side of the balance are the cold, unsympathetic dollars; on the other side are the lives, the happiness, and existence of human beings.

Surely the law ought to make a distinction between the two. Human happiness and human welfare ought not to be put on the auction block and knocked off to the highest bidder as a chattel may be. The only reason why trusts and combinations are declared illegal is because they are organized and operated for the express purpose of the more effectively exploiting the people by taking advantage of their necessities and controlling the price of these necessities to the consumers, as well as the purchase price which they have to pay for the raw material. They do this by consolidating or controlling all business in their line and thereby shutting out competition. Combinations of capital seek to control both the selling and purchasing price of all articles of necessity.

Labor seeks only to protect the selling price of one article, to wit, his brawn and muscle. This amendment protects the labor organizations, farmers' organizations, and fraternal organizations from the operation of the Sherman antitrust law, and in that the Democratic Party fulfills another pledge made in its platform.

I am truly glad to see our Republican friends lining up for this amendment; true some of us remember that for 16 long years of Republican rule they never found it convenient to protect the laborers of this country from the effects of the Sherman antitrust law, still we welcome them over to our standard and say we will gladly accept your votes even though you had to be forced to do it by a Democratic Congress.

I think that every Member here recognizes that one of the big questions before us it to deal fairly and right with labor and capital. For a long time I have felt that capital is largely responsible for the struggle that is on between the employer and the employee. Capital has been too domineering and selfish. I once heard the president of a large operating coal company, in dealing with the demand of their employees for better wages, say, "What right have these d—n fellows to make demands on us and attempt to tell us how we shall run our business? We have thousands invested and they haven't a penny." I said to him, "That is where you are radically wrong. These laborers have infinitely more invested in the business than you have. You have only a portion of your money invested and these laborers have their very existence and the existence of their wives and children invested, and who can measure the love of a parent for his child, or who will attempt to do so in cold dollars and cents?" Mr. Chairman, let us not deal with the comfort and happiness of human beings as we deal with steel rails, oil, and other commodities.

I repeat what I said in the beginning, that labor organizations and farmers' organizations ought not to be placed in the same category with organizations formed for the express purpose of making money. I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] is recognized.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, it was with considerable interest I took up the study of this very important measure. The more I delved into it the more and more I became impressed with the absolute need of an amendment such as has been offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. I realize and appreciate the importance of this bill, because I believe it is one of the most important that has or will come before this House for consideration.

ORIGINAL CLAUSE UNSATISFACTORY.

When it was reported by the Judiciary Committee I, as well as a number of my colleagues, went over it with careful deliberation, section by section, and when we reached section 7 it was apparent that it did not and could not meet expectations.

We asked the committee to change the phraseology so as to give labor organizations and farmers' organizations and beneficial societies the recognition promised in the Democratic platform. After some consideration the committee agreed to do so.

I desire to say to the Members who are hesitating about voting for the amendment that it is my sincere belief that the Webb amendment gives labor, gives the farmers, and gives the beneficial organizations the relief they are seeking. And I want to add that by following the recommendations of the Judiciary Committee we are doing that which the members of the great American Federation of Labor, what the members of the great Brotherhoods of Railroad Trainmen, the Railroad Conductors, the Railroad Firemen, the Railroad Engineers, and the farmers' organizations, that are directly and vitally interested in this legislation, desire we should do.

DISTINCT LINE DRAWN.

In consideration of their wishes, in consideration of the great moral issue involved, and in consideration of the world desire to draw the line between labor and its product, and in consideration of the desire to give the farmer as well as the laborer a greater scope, so that they may develop, so that they may live with a greater degree of comfort, so that they may prosper; and when these great forces are content the leaven of a greater and better mankind will dominate in this country; and I ask you, in consideration of all these things, to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Chairman, wherever the working people have made progress some form of organization has been the agency that has transformed individual impotency into collective strength—fraternities, lodges, merchant guilds, craft guilds have been helpful; but the labor unions—trades-unions—have been the most potent factors in the forward movement.

HIGHER STANDARD OF LIFE.

The demand for higher wages represents the conviction that a constantly greater share of increased social wealth should go to those who create it. The progress of humanity results from the elimination of poverty. Poverty means degrading environment and influence that result in intellectual and moral degeneration. Permanent amelioration of the human lot must have as its basis material resources. The next step is to distribute these products so that the greatest number may fairly benefit thereby. As an element in the forces determining distribution, the trade-union has been most potent. A comparison of conditions prevailing among the unorganized with those that have employed collective bargaining reveals unmistakable proofs of the beneficent results due to trade-unionism. Higher wages mean better homes, better clothing, better food, better bodies and minds, recreation, a higher standard of life.

The aim for a higher standard of life is the incentive for the demand for a shorter workday. The verdicts of modern scientists are confirming the fundamental importance of this demand which the trade-union has so long been pressing. These scientists are warning us against the danger to the race from the continuous industrial strain and concentration of energy in modern industry. Commerce and industry can be allowed to exploit the leisure of the workers only at the expense of national well-being. The shorter workday means increased efficiency of the worker in the shop, better, longer, and happier living, and development of the higher emotions and feelings. It increases the productive period of the worker, lengthens his life, and enables him longer to provide for those dependent upon him, that the children may have an opportunity to taste of the pleasures of child life before assuming the burdens of the human "struggle for existence."

CONSERVE HUMAN RESOURCES.

This more efficient, more human worker demands better working conditions, the aim being to conserve human resources. Much has been done to let pure air and sunshine into working places, to exclude conditions breeding organisms injurious to life, but ever-increasing knowledge and the widening of our conception forbid us to stop or stay in the crusade for human welfare. Among all the organizations on the American continent working upon the various phases of this great problem, in my opinion, the great American Federation of Labor is the leader, and has often been the pioneer blazing the way.

These three demands of organized labor are comprehended in this larger and ultimate ideal—to enrich, enlarge, and magnify humanity. The influence and the potency of the American labor movement are so well appreciated by the thinkers and leaders in our Nation's affairs that almost every considerable movement for humanitarian, economic, or political reform has endeavored to enlist their approval and support. Men of labor play an honorable and important part in the affairs of this great Nation. They are daily helping to determine its destiny.

For years the laboring people have contended that the Sherman antitrust law was never intended to apply and should not have been applied to the voluntary organizations of the working people. By reason of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Hatters' case, and of several courts in other cases, that law was made to apply to organizations of workers. It is unnecessary at this time to recount the various phases and the developments of the efforts to secure remedial legislation which the working people of the country have so long and so justly demanded.

THE SEVENTH SECTION.

In this bill, dealing with supplementary legislation on the Sherman antitrust law, is incorporated the following section as amended:

"Section 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural, or horticultural organizations, orders or associations instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations, orders, or associations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof, nor shall such organizations, orders, or associations, or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws."

There are other sections of this bill which deal with the regulation and limitation of the issuance of injunctions. There are sections dealing with the subject of the regulation of contempt proceedings and providing for jury trials in alleged indirect contempts. The section dealing with injunctions as amended, in which labor is primarily interested, is as follows:

"SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employee, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

THE RESTRAINING HAND.

"And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do, or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute, any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peacefully assembling at any place in a lawful manner, and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in absence of such dispute by any party thereto, nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful.

CONTEMPT CASES; JURY TRIALS.

"SEC. 19. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia by doing any act or thing therein, or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 20. That whenever it shall be made to appear to any district court or judge thereof or to any judge therein sitting, by the return of a proper officer on lawful process, or upon the affidavit of some credible person, or by information filed by any district attorney, that there is reasonable ground to believe that any person has been guilty of such contempt, the court or judge thereof, or any judge therein sitting, may issue a rule requiring the said person so charged to show cause upon a day certain why he should not be punished therefor; which rule, together with a copy of the affidavit or information, shall be served upon the person charged with sufficient promptness to enable him to prepare for and make return to the order at the time fixed therein. If upon or by such return, in the judgment of the court the alleged contempt be not sufficiently purged, a trial shall be directed at a time and place fixed by the court: Provided, however, That if the accused, being a natural person, fail or refuse to make return to the rule to show cause, an attachment may issue against his person to compel an answer, and in case of his continued failure or refusal, or if for any reason it be impracticable to dispose of the matter on the return day, he may be required to give reasonable bail for his attendance at the trial and his submission to the final judgment of the court. Where the accused person is a body corporate, an attachment for the sequestration of its property may be issued upon like refusal or failure to answer.

"In all cases within the purview of this act such trial may be by the court or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury, in which latter event the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance, or the court or the judge thereof in chambers may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be selected and summoned, as provided by law, to attend at the time and place of trial, at which time a jury shall be selected and impaneled as upon a trial for misdemeanor; and such trial shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or upon information.

THE PUNISHMENT PRESCRIBED.

"SEC. 21. That the evidence taken upon the trial of any person so accused may be preserved by bill of exceptions, and any judgment of conviction may be reviewed upon writ of error in all respects as now provided by law in criminal cases, and may be affirmed, reversed, or modified, as justice may require. Upon the granting of such writ of error, execution of judgment shall be stayed and the accused, if thereby sentenced to imprisonment, shall be admitted to bail in such reasonable sum as may be required by the court, or by any justice, or any judge of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 22. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States, but the same and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 19 of this act may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

"SEC. 23. That no proceeding for contempt shall be instituted against any person unless begun within one year from the date of the act complained of; nor shall any such proceeding be a bar to any criminal prosecution for the same act or acts; but nothing herein contained shall affect any proceedings in contempt pending at the time of the passage of this act."

SOCIETY AND JUSTICE.

The foregoing paragraphs, as amended by the Judiciary Committee, indicate plainly that justice is the purpose toward which society is groping slowly—uncertainly yet ultimately. The ideal may change and shift, but justice ever remains the goal. The law of the land embodies concepts of rights that must be granted individuals to secure them freedom of self-development and action. Justice exists when these rights are accorded to all individuals.

To the courts of our country belongs the duty of making justice a forceful reality in the lives of men. The courts are the guardians of the rights and ideals of the Nation. They are the agencies by which justice is brought into the lives of people. If they do justice, they create respect for governmental authority. If they deny justice, they create contempt for law and rebellion against governmental authority.

American courts have an unusually grave responsibility, for their power has become practically unlimited. Their power to interpret law and to pass upon its constitutionality makes them superior to the legislatures. Judges are the least responsible of all our govenmental agents.

An independent judiciary is necessary for purity of justice. Yet this very independence constitutes a menace, for judges are human, and may allow practices and concepts to become established which pervert justice. Such perversions of justice have been the reason for all the great legal reforms. Such perversions of equity courts now demand reform.

POWER OF EQUITY COURTS.

Equity courts were established in England to infuse into legalism a morality which was precluded by the strict letter of the law. Practically all equity law has resulted from judicial legislation. The judge makes the law, determines whether or not his law is violated, and determines the penalty for any violations of his law. Therefore equity proceedings reflect the personal attitude of mind, convictions, and animus of the individual judge.

The power built up by equity courts in the United States is unlimited. Like all arbitrary power, it has been abused. The particular class of abuses that has caused the greatest injustice and has aroused most bitter discontent is the use of the injunctive process in industrial disputes to regulate personal relations and to assume the functions of the law courts.

The writ of injunction was intended to protect property against injury from which the law afforded no protection. Under the influences of judges who had no personal knowledge of industrial affairs, no sympathy with workers in industry, and no understanding of the difference between property rights and personal rights, injunctions have been issued for the purposes which transform the agencies of justice into engines of injustice and oppression.

BURDENS OF INDUSTRY.

Those who bear the burdens of industry and the brunt of whatever injustice prevails have for years, in protest, called attention to grievous wrongs that have been inflicted upon them by the courts.

The effort to secure decent working conditions, a fair wage, and reasonable hours of work has involved the workers in a struggle with all the forces of greed and intrenched power, whose aim is to deny the growing economic and social demands of the workers.

The struggle has not infrequently degenerated into a conscienceless war to hold the workers in subordination and in the domination of every political agent to accomplish this purpose. Judges have been induced to serve this purpose—some consciously and some unconsciously. Injunctions have been issued that deny workers rights guaranteed them by constitutional and statutory laws; that deny workers freedom of speech, press, and normal action.

Judges have sentenced workers for doing that which they have a lawful right to do; have sentenced them for violations of the injunctions when the injunctions themselves were issued in direct contravention of specific inhibitions of law. Let us present the basic principles which determine the jurisdiction of equity courts and limit their powers.

INJUNCTIONS AND THEIR IMPORT.

The writ of injunction should be exercised exclusively for the protection of property and property rights.

To secure the aid of equity courts by the injunction process the petitioner must have no other remedy at law.

He who seeks equity must come into court with clean hands.

The injunction writ must never be used to regulate personal relations or to curtail personal rights.

Equity power—injunctions—must never be used in an effort to punish crime. This is the function of the law courts.

The equity courts must not be used as a means to set aside trial by jury.

In all America there is not a man learned in the law who will dispute that the principles just stated are the fundamental bases for equity procedure in the issuance of injunctions.

DEMANDS FOR JUSTICE.

Mr. Chairman, though courts have jailed workers, they have not silenced indignant protest or stifled or jailed love and demand for justice. Though they have jailed workers for contempt of unwarranted judicial orders, they have not been able to jail their contempt for arbitrary abuse and usurpation of authority. With defiant challenge of wrong, the workers demand that the courts of justice be restored to their rightful purposes; that they be made the courts of all the people, and not the courts of a privileged class—the employing class. There are those who believe that American workers exaggerate the need for legislation to prevent abuses of the injunctive process. There are others who wish to create that impression in order to retain the special privileges and advantages these abuses afford them. All the forces of prejudice and greed are lined up to prevent legislation which shall free the workers from restrictions upon normal efforts to protect and further their own material interests.

GOVERNMENT BY INJUNCTION.

What is "government by injunction" or, in other words, the misuse of the equity power? It is the modern use of the writ of injunction, especially in labor disputes, which is revolutionary and destructive of popular government.

Our Government was designed to be a government by law, said law to be enacted by the legislative branch, construed by the judiciary, and administered by the executive.

An injunction is "an extraordinary writ issued out of equity enjoining a threatened injury to property or property rights where there is not a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law."

The definition of equity is: "The application of right and justice to the legal adjustment of differences where the law, by reason of its universality is deficient" or "that system of jurisprudence which comprehends every matter of law for which the common law provides no remedy * * * springing originally from the royal prerogative, moderating the harshness of the common law according to good conscience." In other words, it is the exercise of power according to the judgment and conscience of one man.

PROPERTY RIGHTS.

It was for this reason that in Great Britain, whence the United States derives its system of equity, as well as of law, the equity power was limited to the protection of property or property rights, and in such cases only where there was no remedy at law; the words adequate and complete have been added here.

When the courts of equity take jurisdiction over and issue injunctions in labor disputes they do so to protect business, which, under late rulings by several courts, is held to be property. These rulings are disputed and condemned by other courts, which hold that relations between employers and employees—between buyer and seller—are personal relations, and as such, if regulated at all, are regulated by statute or common law only. If the latter contention be right, and of this we believe there can be no question, the ruling that makes business property or the right to carry on or continue in business a property right is revolutionary and must lead to a complete change, not only in our industrial, but in our political life. If the court of equity be permitted to regulate personal relations, it will gradually draw to itself all legislative power. If it be permitted to set aside or to enforce law, it will ultimately arrogate to itself jurisdiction now held by the law courts and abolish trial by jury.

LAW AND EQUITY.

The Constitution confers equity power upon the courts by stating that they shall have jurisdiction in law and in equity in the same way that it makes it their duty to issue the writ of habeas corpus and in substantially the same way as it provides for trial by jury. Equity power came to us as it existed in England at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, and it was so limited and defined by English authorities that our courts could not obtain jurisdiction in labor disputes except by the adoption of a ruling that business is property.

If business be property in the case of a strike or boycott, and can therefore be protected by the equity court against diminution of its usual income, caused by a strike or boycott conducted by the working people, then it necessarily must be property at other times and therefore entitled to be protected against loss of income caused by competition from other manufacturers or business men. Business and the income from business would become territorial and would be in the same position as land and the income from land. The result would be to make all competition in trade unlawful; it would prevent anyone from engaging in trade or manufacture unless he comply with the whims and fancies of those who have their trade or means of production already established.

No one could enter into business except through inheritance, bequest, or sale.

DEFINITION OF PROPERTY.

In order to show the fallacy of this new definition of property we here state the accepted legal definitions of property, business, and labor.

Definition of property: Property means the dominion of indefinite right of user and disposition which one lawfully exercises over particular things or subjects and generally to the exclusion of all others. Property is ownership, the exclusive right of any person freely to use, enjoy, and dispose of any determinate object, whether real or personal. (English and American Encyclopedia of Law.)

Property is the exclusive right of possessing, enjoying, and disposing of a thing. (Century Dictionary.)

A right imparting to the owner a power of indefinite user, capable of being transmitted to universal successors by way of descent, and imparting to the owner the power of disposition from himself and his successors. (Austin, Jurisprudence.)

SOLE DESPOTIC DOMINION.

The sole and despotic dominion which one claims and exercises over the external things of the world in total exclusion of the right of any other individual in the world. (Blackstone.)

It will be seen that property is the products of nature or of labor, and the essential element is that it may be disposed of by sale, be given away, or in any other way transferred to another.

There is no distinction in law between property and property rights.

From these definitions it is plain that labor power or patronage can not be property, but aside from this we have the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting slavery and involuntary servitude.

LABOR AND PROPERTY.

Labor power can not be property, because it can not be separated from the laborer. It is personal. It grows with health, diminishes in sickness, and ceases at death. It is an attribute of life.

The ruling of certain courts makes of the laborer a serf, of patronage an evidence of servitude, by assuming that one may have a property right in the labor or patronage of another.

Definition of business: That which occupies the time, attention, and labor of men for the purpose of livelihood or profit; that which occupies the time, attention, and labor of man for the purpose of profit and improvement. (American and English Encycl. of Law.)

That which busies or that which occupies the time, attention, or labor of one as his principal concern, whether for a longer or shorter time. (Webster's Dictionary.)

Definition of labor: Physical or mental effort, particularly for some useful or desired end. Exertion of the powers for some end other than recreation or sport. (Century Dictionary.)

It will be seen from the definitions that while there is a fundamental difference between property and business there is none at all between business and labor, so that if business be property, so is labor, and if the earning power of business can be protected by equity power through injunction, so can the earning power of labor; in other words, the laborer may obtain an injunction against a reduction of his wages or against a discharge, which would stop the wages entirely.

If this new definition of property, by including therein business and labor, be accepted, then the judge sitting in equity becomes the irresponsible master of all men who do business or who labor.

DISCRETIONARY GOVERNMENT.

We contend that equity power and jurisdiction—discretionary government by the judiciary—for well-defined purposes and within specific limitations granted to the courts by the Constitution, has been so extended that it is invading the field of government by law and endangering constitutional liberty; that is, the personal liberty of the individual citizen.

As government by equity—personal government—advances, republican government—government by law—recedes.

We have escaped from the despotic government of the king. We realized that, after all, he was but a man. Are we going to permit the growing up of a despotic government by the judges? Are not they also men?

PRESERVATION OF LIBERTY.

The despotism of one can, in this sense, be no better than the despotism of another. If we are to preserve "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," any usurpation by the judiciary must be as sternly resisted as usurpation by the executive.

What labor is now seeking is the assistance of all liberty-loving men in restoring the common-law definitions of property, and in restricting the jurisdiction of the equity courts in that connection to what it was at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

To those who ask proof of the justice of labor's demands for correction of abuses of the injunctive process there is no better proof than can be found in the injunctions of Judge Dayton, of the Federal District Court for the Northern District of West Virginia. No injunctions have been more persistent, arbitrary, flagrant abuses of judicial power than those issued by that court.

CONDITIONS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Conditions in that district are conducive to such abuses—West Virginia is a corporation-ridden State. The coal companies own vast tracts of territory over which they exercise practically absolute control. Their great industrial power has created the false impression that profits for the companies are tantamount to prosperity for the State. The companies have been allowed to interpret what constitutes prosperity and how it shall be maintained. Company managers are held responsible for profits. Naturally they condemn anything that decreases profits or "interferes" with business. That human rights may conflict with property rights is to them of no consequence, for they think property rights only concern profits. As what could not be accomplished in "other ways" was done through injunctions—the coal fields of West Virginia have been an injunction-governed district.

WORKERS DENIED CERTAIN RIGHTS.

The injunction rule that Judge Jackson inaugurated Judge Dayton has maintained with great "efficiency." The purpose of that rule is to deny free workers the right to organize in order to better their working conditions. Every agent of Government and force has been used to maintain the mines nonunion—to maintain the same "freedom" that the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. is trying to force upon the miners of Colorado. The serious injustice that has resulted is most conclusively demonstrated by the injunctions issued by Judge Dayton against the coal miners during the strike of 1912–13.

The West Virginia-Pittsburgh Coal Co., incorporated under the laws of West Virginia, and operating large coal mines in the northern Panhandle district of West Virginia, petitioned for and obtained from Judge Dayton, on September 29, 1913, a temporary restraining order. The restraining order forbade the officers of the United Mine Workers, "their committees, agents, servants, confederates, and associates, and all persons who now are, or hereafter may be, members of said United Mine Workers of America, and all persons combining and conspiring with the said designated persons, and all other persons whomsoever, and each and every one of them" from organizing the company's mines, from "conspiring" to inaugurate a strike against the company, or from doing anything to aid in any strike against the company. The restraining order with slight modifications was made a preliminary injunction December 2, 1913.

OUTRAGE AGAINST RIGHTS.

Mr. Chairman, the injunction is so preposterous, such an outrage against the rights of the workers, such an arrogant usurpation of power, that the specific inhibitions are given in full. In reading the injunction and considering the things which the miners are forbidden to do, the extensive land holdings of the company should be held in mind. The miners lived in the company's houses, built upon the company's property. It was impossible for them to move outside their own dwellings without "trespassing" upon the company's land.

The wording of the injunction is also significant. The words are so chosen as to convey the idea that normal, lawful activities are "conspiracies." The injunction assumes the lawful right of the company to whatever relations with its employees will produce greatest profits, and to regard those relations as part of the right to do business. The "right to continue service" from employees is the basis for several prohibitions. Judge Dayton assumed that a strike is unlawful, that labor organizations and their purposes are illegal.

SPECIFIC PROHIBITIONS IN JUDGE DAYTON'S INJUNCTION.

The officers and the present and future members of the United Mine Workers, their associates, and all other persons are enjoined and restrained:

"1. From interfering and from combining, conspiring, or attempting to interfere with employees of the plaintiff for the purpose of unionizing plaintiff's mine, without plaintiff's permission and consent, and in aid of such purpose knowingly and willfully bringing about in any manner the breaking by plaintiff's employees of contracts of service known to them at the time to exist which plaintiff now has with his employees, and from knowingly and willfully bringing about in any manner the breaking by plaintiff's employees of contracts of service which may hereafter be entered into by persons with plaintiff and be known to them, while the relationship of the employer and employee as to such employee so brought to break his contract exists, and especially from knowingly and willfully enticing plaintiff's employees, present or future, knowing such relationship, while the relationship of the employer and employee, as to such employee enticed, exists, to leave plaintiff's service, giving or assigning directly or indirectly as a reason for any such act so brought about, or enticing and leaving the plaintiff's service, that plaintiff does not recognize the United Mine Workers of America, or that plaintiff runs a nonunion mine, or that the interests of the United Mine Workers of America require that plaintiff shall not be permitted to run a nonunion mine, or that the interests of the union will be best promoted thereby.

"2. From interfering and combining, conspiring, or attempting to interfere with the employees of plaintiff so as knowingly and willfully to bring about in any manner the breaking by the plaintiff's employees of contracts of service known to them at the time to exist, which plaintiff has with its employees, and from knowingly and willfully bringing about in any manner the breaking by plaintiff's employees of contracts of service which may hereafter be entered into by persons with plaintiff, and be known to them, while the relationship of employer and employee, as to such employee so brought to break his contract exists, and especially from knowingly and willfully enticing plaintiff's employees, present or future, knowing such relationship of employer and employee as to such employee so enticed exists, to leave plaintiff's service without plaintiff's consent, against plaintiff's will, and to plaintiff's injury.

SOME STARTLING SPECIFICATIONS.

"3. From interfering with, hindering, or obstructing the business of plaintiff, or its agents, servants, or employees, in the discharge of their duties as such, at and about plaintiff's mines or elsewhere, by trespassing on or entering upon the grounds and premises of the plaintiff, or within its mines for the purpose of interfering therewith, or hindering or obstructing its business in any manner whatsoever, or with the purpose of compelling or inducing, by threats, or force, intimidation, violence, violent or abusive language, or persuasion, any of the employees of plaintiff to refuse or fail to perform their duties as such employees.

"4. From compelling or inducing, or attempting to compel or induce, by threats, intimidation, force, or violence, or abusive or violent language, any of the employees of plaintiff to leave its service or fail or refuse to perform their duties as such employees, or to compel or attempt to compel by threats, intimidation, force, violent or abusive language, any person desiring to seek employment in or about the plaintiff's mine and works from so accepting employment therein.

"5. From entering upon or establishing a picket or pickets of men on or patrolling railroads or highways, public or private, passing through or adjacent to the plaintiff's property for the purpose of inducing or compelling by threats, intimidation, violence, violent or abusive language, or persuasion, any employee of plaintiff to fail or refuse to perform his duties as such, or for the purpose of interviewing or talking to any person or persons on said railroad or highways coming to plaintiff's mines to accept employment with plaintiff, for the purpose and with the intention of inducing and compelling them, by threats, violence, intimidation, violent or abusive language, persuasion, or in any other manner whatsoever, to refuse or fail to accept service with plaintiff.

REGULATING THE EMPLOYEE.

"6. From compelling or inducing or attempting to compel or induce by threats, force, intimidation, or violent or abusive language any employee of said plaintiff to refuse or fail to perform his duties as such employee; and from compelling or attempting to compel, induce by threats, intimidation, force, or violence, or abusive or violent language, any such employee to leave the service of plaintiff; and by like methods to prevent or attempt to prevent any person desiring to accept employment with plaintiff in or about its mines or works or elsewhere from doing so by threats, violence, intimidation, or violent or abusive language.

"7. From interfering in any manner whatsoever, either by threats, violence, intimidation, persuasion, or entreaty with any person in the employment of plaintiff who has contracted with and is in the actual service of plaintiff, to entice or induce him to quit the service of plaintiff or fail or refuse to perform his duties under this contract of employment, and from ordering, aiding, directing, assisting, or abetting in any manner whatsoever any person or persons to commit any or either of the acts aforesaid.

"8. From congregating at or near the premises of plaintiff, and from picketing or patrolling said premises for the purpose of intimidating plaintiff's employees or coercing them by threats, intimidation, violence, abusive or violent language, or preventing them, in the manner aforesaid, from rendering their service to the plaintiff; and in like manner from inducing or coercing them to leave the employment of plaintiff; and from in any manner so interfering with the plaintiff in carrying on its business in its usual and ordinary way; and from interfering by threats, intimidation, violence, violent or abusive language, with any person or persons who may be employed or seek employment by plaintiff in the operation of the plaintiff's mines or works.

RIGHTS OF LABOR QUESTIONED.

"9. From either singly or in combination with others collecting in and about the approaches to plaintiff's mines and works for the purpose of picketing or patrolling or guarding the highway and approaches to the property of the plaintiff for the purpose of intimidating, threatening, or coercing any of plaintiff's employees from working in its said mines or works, or any person seeking employment therein, from entering into such employment, and from interfering with said employees in going to and from their daily work in and about the mines and works of plaintiff.

"10. And from either singly or collectively going to the homes and boarding homes of plaintiff's employees, or any of them, for the purpose of intimidating or coercing any or all of them to leave plaintiff's employment."

The injunction then enjoins the miners from "conspiring" to strike, from even using "persuasion" to "induce" employees to strike, from "trespassing," that is, going outside their homes for the purpose of "enticing" employees to leave the company's service. Can these workers be free if they do not have the right to stop work? If they have that right, how can they be restrained from "conspiring" to exercise it?

WHAT FREEDOM MEANS.

Mr. Chairman, have free workers a right to organize to promote their own welfare and happiness? How can they be restrained from conspiring to achieve that purpose, even without the permission of the company? In organization workers exercise personal rights. Note the skillful twist of this injunction specialist in the phrase "unionizing plaintiff's mine," which is intended to give the impression that property rights were endangered.

Note in section 3 another touch of the expert—"elsewhere"—limitless, boundless "elsewhere." And again "in any manner whatsoever." Can any judge be justified in forbidding the United Mine Workers from obstructing the business of the West Virginia-Pittsburgh Coal Co. "in any manner whatsoever"? Think of the manifold activities, perfectly legal, normal activities, covered by the phrase "in any manner whatsoever."

DESPOTIC LEGISLATION.

How can justice exist when a judge is permitted to issue injunctions which amount to despotic legislation? If even one judge may under existing conditions deprive even one worker of rights necessary to his freedom, then those existing conditions must be changed without delay. One human being is more valuable than a mine. But Judge Dayton ruthlessly trampled upon the rights of many workers, and by precedent all workers.

In section 5 the miners are forbidden to use railroads, private or public highways "passing through or adjacent to the plaintiff's property" for the purpose of "interviewing" or "talking to any person" or "in any manner whatsoever" to explain working conditions in the mines to enlist support for the cause of the strikers. Think of it—freedom of speech denied by an injunction in order to help the mine operators to keep their employees or "prospective employees" ignorant of their opposition to organized labor, higher wages, and better conditions of work.

The prohibitions of section 6 are not for the purpose of protecting mine property, but are for the very obvious purpose of helping the operators to fasten their grip upon their unorganized, impoverished employees. What property right has the West Virginia-Pittsburgh Coal Co. in the labor power of its employees? It has no property or property right in the labor of the mines. Then by what authority can any judge command workers not to induce fellow workers to refuse or fail to perform personal service—labor? If any of those conducting the strike should become too vehement in the manner of their inducement there is recourse at law for disturbance of the peace, and so forth. Assuming that the purpose of a judge in issuing an injunction may be good, yet by usurping authority, by establishing a precedent that constitutes a menace to free institutions, the issuance of that injunction is a greater and more far-reaching wrong than any act of violence by a worker overwrought from a sense of injustice.

ENTICE OR INDUCE ILLEGAL.

In section 7 members of organized labor and "all other persons whomsoever" are enjoined from interfering "in any manner" to "induce" the employees of the company to strike, or from ordering, aiding, directing, assisting, or abetting a strike "in any manner whatsoever." A strike is legal, yet this judge presumes to forbid free man to "entice or induce" free workers to "commit" legal acts.

What is the value of law if irresponsible judges may ignore it and substitute their own orders? How long can a constitutional government be maintained under judicial anarchy? How long can such a judiciary retain the respect of just, law-abiding citizens? Under section 7 of the injunction payment of strike benefits are prohibited; distribution of food and clothing to strikers and their families; every charitable impulse and every sympathetic desire to help those fighting for industrial justice are forbidden.

The prohibitions of section 8 are based upon the assumption that the right of the company to "carry on its business in its usual and ordinary way" is so sacred that the judicial authority of the United States may be exerted to protect that right and to prevent striking miners from securing higher wages and better working conditions.

Sections 9 and 10 prohibit the miners' officials and all persons whomsoever from singly or collectively using their influence with the company's employees or any seeking employment with the company to join the strikers' cause.

WRITTEN CONTRACTS BINDING.

The injunction contains several references to contracts of workers, implying that the company entered into written contracts with its employees equally binding upon both. Miners testified that they were hired from day to day under no formal contract; in fact, the only way the coal company could have had a contract with its employees was through the method it had rejected—collective bargaining with the representatives of its employees. Even had such a contract existed, it would give the employers no right to enforce performance of specific services.

The thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States is a specific denial of such a right. It reads:

Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Those who know the industrial world know the powerful, heartless force of greed which opposes betterment of working conditions in order to maintain high profits; they know the long, unending struggle of the workers from slavery up to greater freedom; they know that in law, philosophy, and even in common phrases of speech are incorporated principles or fragments of principles based upon the concept that workers are slaves. All these constitute barriers to the freedom and progress of the workers. Many eminent conscientious judges do not understand this struggle of labor in effort to establish distinctions between human rights and property rights and to secure legal recognition of human rights for those who labor.

TRADITION MOLDS SYMPATHIES.

This injunction issued by Judge Dayton is typical of the injustice done by those whose habit of thought and sympathies are molded by traditions of the sacredness of property. Government was first established to protect property, but its functions have been constantly widened until now they extend to the protection of individuals and their rights as human beings. Some judges have not yet sensed this development; such a one is Judge Dayton, another is Judge Taft, one of those who inaugurated the practice of using injunctions to help employers against their employees in industrial conflicts.

Perhaps some qualm of an unsuspected conscience moved Judge Dayton to add the following paragraph to the temporary injunction:

The plaintiff's employees who have signed and entered into contracts introduced in evidence in this suit have the right at any time to terminate the contract and to go to work elsewhere, and when they have done so they have a perfect right to join the union of the United Mine Workers of America or any other labor union, and nothing in this order shall be construed as in any manner limiting their said rights.

A vague suspicion seems to be stirring in the judge's intellect, causing him to think that even labor unions may be legal in some localities. Perhaps he may have yet another idea, and wonder how, if labor unions be lawful, men may be legally restrained from joining them.

JUDGE DAYTON'S CONTEMPT DECISIONS.

On November 11, 1913, the West Virginia-Pittsburg Coal Co. filed a petition and several affidavits asking that Van Bittner, president of the Pittsburgh district of the United Mine Workers, several employees of the coal company, and Meyer Schwartz, a local storekeeper who had leased to the United Mine Workers land upon which to hold meetings, be attached for contempt of alleged violation of the restraining order.

The injunctions and the suit brought, as we have already shown, were for the purpose of enabling the coal company to invoke the assistance of a Federal court in its controversy with its employees concerning wages and hours of employment. Is not this occasion sufficiently serious to cause thoughtful citizens to ponder upon the effect that such interference will have upon the attitude of the workers toward governmental authority and their respect for law and the judiciary? Injustice ever begets discontent and demands for reform. A wise and generous nation will give heed to these demands, however crude their expression. Sea captains might as well scuttle their ship as to ignore signs of approaching storms. The workers will not always patiently endure both burdens and injustice.

In March, 1914, some thirteen or fourteen of the employees of the company and three or four organizers of the United Mine Workers were tried at Philippi, W. Va., a town situated at a distance of about 150 miles from the company's mines, although the original chancery suit had been docketed at Wheeling, only a few miles from the mines.

JUDGE DAYTON'S METHODS.

Judge Dayton tried the cases, of course, without a jury. Particularly significant of his judicial attitude is the fact that he permitted hearsay and all kinds of evidence to be introduced before him, declaring that he would later determine for himself what part of the evidence was legally admissible and what part should be excluded.

The court rested its decision upon the supposition that the United Mine Workers is an illegal conspiracy and took "judicial notice" that in the chancery cause of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. John Mitchell et al., an entirely separate and distinct case now pending in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, the court had found and determined the United Mine Workers of America to be an unlawful organization, "an unlawful and criminal conspiracy both under common law and the Federal Sherman Trust Act."

It follows that if a Federal judge can "take judicial notice" that the United Mine Workers of America has been determined an illegal conspiracy in another case, now pending before the court, any finding of a court may be regarded as established for any other case, and any Federal judge may "take judicial notice" that any other voluntary association of working people is "at common law and under the Federal Sherman Act" likewise an illegal conspiracy. If this precedent be established, any injustice may thus be perpetuated to the lasting injury of the working people, and, regardless of evidence in particular cases before a court, that court will be able to act upon "judicial notice" of what has happened in other cases.

ARGUMENT FOR REVISION.

These new abuses introduced by Judge Dayton constitute one more pressing argument for revision of the law and the practice regulating injunctions as well as the Sherman antitrust law. The application of the Sherman antitrust law to organizations of workers and the issuance of injunctions to regulate personal relations are based upon the same fundamental principle—that labor power is property. The workers demand that they be recognized as freemen, that the rights be restored to them which were theirs before the courts applied law and legal principles in a manner that robs them of personal rights of freemen.

In announcing his findings in the case, Judge Dayton called attention to a number of acts "committed" by the defendants as evidence of violations of the restraining order. Among them are these:

A few days after, on Sunday, Van Bittner and Oates appeared at the mine at Collier with a brass band of about 35 men, followed by a procession of some 125 organization men and sympathizers, from Steubenville, Ohio, largely, who marched across the company's property and held a meeting on the public road, which meeting was addressed by Bittner.

Shortly afterwards Oates rented from Myer Schwarz a small angle of unoccupied ground, possibly an eighth of an acre, surrounded on two or three sides by the company's property and an old road, about 1,000 feet from the company's pit mouth, and erected two tents there over which was placed a large sign, "Headquarters of the United Mine Workers of America." For the rental of this ground for six months Oates paid Schwarz $200, as he admitted, out of the organization funds, although the true rental value did not exceed for this six months $10 or $12 at most.

STRUGGLING TO ESTABLISH.

All acts of the miners struggling to establish better conditions of life and work in West Virginia should be considered in their relation to the power of the mine operators. That power was made practically supreme by ownership of the property and land upon which the miners must live and move. It was maintained by supervision of post offices, by control over stores and supplies, by ownership and control over schools and churches, by the company's mine guards, agents of detection and compulsion. These miners did not have one square foot of ground on which to exercise their guaranteed rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; not one square foot for freedom of speech and the promotion of their own welfare and interest. Yet under the vague all-inclusive terms of a judicial order, a Federal agent of justice assumes the power to punish free men for renting a strip of ground upon which to live, to organize a union, and to carry out the normal and lawful purposes of that union. Under that restraining order the officials of the Mine Workers' Union are forbidden to give that organization friendly advice as to how to promote their interests or to aid them in efforts in any manner whatsoever. The purpose of this restraining order was to prevent organization among the workers, to prevent all methods by which the miners could make their protests effective, and to use the Federal courts as a strike-breaking agency in order to assist the mine operators to "control" their men to conduct their business in any manner that assured the highest dividends.

CONSPICUOUS ILLUSTRATION.

A funeral of a miner killed by the company's hired thugs was made conspicuous as an illustration of the company's method of dealing with men who retain a spark of independence. This the judge particularly notices in his findings.

Judge Dayton points out that funds of the United Mine Workers were used to retain lawyers to defend the men before the courts; to pay the fines of men arrested, and to furnish bail bonds. Could any judicial situation be more intolerable? What manner of justice does injunctive rule establish when it becomes unlawful to pay moneys demanded by the law?

In considering the defendants individually and in sentencing them Judge Dayton said:

Now the eighth paragraph of this finding will be to the effect that, while I do not deem it necessary in law to show further the connection of these men than that they joined this organization and were part and parcel of it, yet it will be in effect the setting forth of the individual acts of these defendants, and I propose to find these facts.

VERY QUEER VERDICT.

Frank Ledvinka was called before the court and declared guilty of the following:

This court will find that you are an organizer of the United Mine Workers, and have been for the last seven years a national organizer; that you come from Ohio for the purpose of organizing and carrying on this strike after the decision in the Hitchman Coal Co. case was decided and determined; that the United Mine Workers was a conspiracy and an unlawful organization; that you divided with James Oates the authority and leadership in directing and controlling the activities of the strikers, made speeches in which you urged the inauguration and the prosecution of the strike; sent Harry Youshack to the home of one of the company's employees to threaten him, aided in defending strikers who were arrested for assaulting nonunion men; broke the promise you made to this court on December 2; advised the strikers that they must fight, must stop the company's employees from working, must beat and assault them for the purpose of preventing them from working; that you were authorized, as stated, by Frank M. Hayes, international vice president of the United Mine Workers of America, to make this attempt to unionize the mines of the Panhandle section of West Virginia, and did what was done in this strike in pursuance of that authority.

EARNEST GIRL REPRIMANDED.

Fannie Sellins, a faithful, earnest girl, struggling to aid and improve the toilers' working conditions, was called before the bar and was thus addressed:

This court finds from this evidence that you are a paid organizer of the United Mine Workers; that you have made the false pretense of being engaged in religious and charity work; that you frequented the camp at Collier, which was not a fit place for any decent woman; spent most of your time with James Oates and Secundo Colliffe, aiding and assisting them in directing the activities of the strikers in preventing the company's employees from working; made inflammatory speeches intended to incite the strikers to acts of violance; incited and attempted assaults on the company's employees at the railroad bridge; aiding in providing supplies for the camp at Collier, using funds of the United Mine Workers; aided in the defense of the strikers arrested for assaulting the company's employees; participated in the attempt to make the Moore funeral a means of inciting the strikers to acts of violence; that you advised the strikers to beat up the nonunion men; that you advised the strikers to go to No. 3 mine and beat and assault nonunion men; that you led a mob of from 150 to 200 men to intercept the company's employees north of Wellsburg, paid their fares on the cars to the place where they divided into three several troops for the purpose of intercepting the company's men, whom you expected to come from work by one of the roads; that you advised the strikers to knock the heads off the nonunion men, whom you designated as "scabs"; preached to the strikers your defiance of the orders of this court and urged them to defy and disobey the court and its injunction; that you broke your promise made to this court on December 2, and, after promising to obey the injunction, made a speech in which your proclaimed your defiance and your intention to continue to disobey the injunction.

This being the evidence, the sentence of this court is that you be imprisoned in the Marion County jail for a period of six months.

EVIDENCE DECLARED FALSE.

Miss Sellins asked, "May I say one word?"

Judge Dayton replied, "Not one word."

Then Miss Sellins said, "That evidence is all false."

To Tom Smith Judge Dayton said:

This court finds from this evidence that you participated in the Moore funeral procession and assisted in the attempt to incite the strikers to violence by carrying banners with inflammatory inscriptions; that you aided in organizing and carrying on the strike at Collier and in many of the acts done there in violation of the injunctions; that you were a part of the time in charge and control of the camp at Collier and directed the picketing and other means of preventing nonunion men from going to work; that you did picket duty yourself for the purpose of preventing nonunion men from going to work; that you trespassed on the company's property after being warned not to do so.

This court sentences you to five months in the Wetzel County jail. Bond, $2,500.

The West Virginia mine operators have made efforts to induce immigrants to go to the State. Workers from countries where the standards of work and life are lower than in the United States, workers unacquainted with the American spirit of independence and self-protection, constitute, for a time at least, docile employees. For this reason the mine operators have sent agents abroad and to the port of New York to direct immigration toward their mines. Some of these miners acquired American views and joined the strike for greater freedom, and because of that are now said to be in danger of deportation as "undesirables." One of these "undesirable foreigners" tainted by American ideals, Ernest Ewald, was found guilty, as follows:

IMMIGRANTS INDUCED.

This court ascertains that you were an occupant of the tents at Collier from the time the camp was established and stayed there for the purpose of picketing the approach to the mine and preventing nonunion men from going to work there and of intimidating those who were working; that you did picket duty for the purpose of preventing nonunion men from going to work there; that you trespassed on the company's property and were fined by the local authorities for so doing; that you stopped men on their way to work at Collier and caused them to turn back and go away; that you patrolled as a picket at the camp at night armed with a gun. You are a foreigner. I have no doubt but what you were misled into this, but, nevertheless, it is clear that you came to this country, where you can make twice as much for a day's wage as you can at your home; yet you preferred to follow this unlawful organization instead of earning your living honestly in legitimate labor and the sweat of your brow. You preferred to take their hired pay of a few dollars a week and work against law and order and peace and sobriety and the rights of men and the rights of property; you preferred to do that. You will be sentenced to three months in the Monongalia County jail. Bond, $1,500.

Another foreigner was given this judicial interpretation of American liberty and justice:

This court finds from the evidence that you frequented the camp at Collier; that you did picket duty for the purpose of preventing the nonunion men from going to work, and trespassed on the company's property at the mouth of the mine frequently.

You are a foreigner, and came to this country for the purpose of improving your condition. You were making more money, twice over, than you could get in your own country, yet you preferred to join this unlawful organization and engage in these unlawful practices rather than to work and make the higher wages, honestly and upright and under the law. You still remained there after you quit work instead of going away and leaving this company to exercise its rights over its own property. I will sentence you to 30 days in the Hancock County jail. Bond, $500.

MENTAL BIAS AND PREJUDICE.

The language of Judge Dayton reflects mental bias and prejudice against the workers. He permitted to be laid before the court as evidence hearsay and other improper testimony. Witnesses for the prosecution were permitted to testify as to facts and occurrences not within their personal knowledge. Witnesses were permitted to testify in such a way that it was not possible to tell what statements were based on personal knowledge and what on information gained from others. Testimony of a prejudicial nature, not pertinent to the charges, was admitted in evidence. The court so ordered, saying that he would determine what should be accepted and what rejected. Yet, in announcing his findings, Judge Dayton said:

Now, gentlemen, touching the questions of these motions that have been made, I want to say I do not regard it as incumbent upon myself as a judge to go to the labor of setting forth in detail what part of this testimony is irrelevant, improper, and immaterial. There are 759 pages of it. I do regard it as my duty to file in these cases a finding of fact from the material and relevant testimony, rejecting the consideration of that which is immaterial and irrelevant.

Judge Dayton's methods destroy the definiteness of rights of law and undermine the foundations of justice.

An appeal was taken to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, where the cases were argued during the first of May.

APPALLING PROOFS.

No more distressing, appalling proofs of need of reform of law relating to the injunctive process can be found than the injunctions issued by Judge Dayton. It is the abuses of judicial authority, jurisdiction, and power that beget bitter, burning indignation against the methods and agents of justice. If we would prevent our courts from being brought into contempt, we must see to it that they are really agents of justice. No court should be prostituted to the service of the private purpose of individuals. No court should be used as a strike-breaking agency.

The restraining order, the temporary injunction, the contempt proceedings in Judge Dayton's court show that the purpose for which the usurpatory power was invoked was not to prevent irreparable injury to property, but to rivet the fetters on the workers to defeat an industrial movement to secure better wages and conditions of work and to prevent any weakening of the autocratic rule and domination of the mine owners.

JUSTICE, TRUTH, AND EQUALITY.

Such "judicial proceedings" will solidify the great labor movement in West Virginia, and with the solidification will come the public awakening, now dormant, to the realization that an autocratic court can only temporarily trample upon the rights of its citizens, but in the end justice, truth, and equality must stand before the American courts as truth, justice, and equality stand before God.

While the period of transition is in progress, while certain courts are cleaning themselves of their present unwholesome associations; throwing off the cloak of selfish and sinister influence, labor will have to fight its battle, make the sacrifice, be punished, reprimanded, and made unhappy; yet so surely as the silver lining follows the cloud, so surely will it emerge from its present unfortunate condition in West Virginia, redeemed and triumphant. And with the redemption will come a clean court, with honor, justice, and equality actuating its every movement; and with the same redemption the court will see about it a happy people, honoring and respecting it because of its strict adhesion to the American principles of justice.

THE RESTRAINING ORDER.

I desire to say a word on the "restraining order" and "temporary injunctions." These legal instruments forbid acts which may cause injury to property, and broadly prohibit any acts which would enable the workers individually or collectively to work in furtherance of their particular interests.

In violation of these intended sacred principles of equity the evident purpose of the West Virginia mine operators was, and in certain sections of the same State now is, to perpetuate anti-union policies for their own greed and aggrandizement, and forcing upon their employees working conditions little better than slavery.

I believe, and it is my sincere conviction, that the principle of justice is of incalculable importance to these miners of West Virginia and to the workers elsewhere in these cases.

I believe in the right of dissatisfied workmen and their sympathizers to organize; to conduct a strike for the purpose of securing better terms and conditions of employment; the right to furnish and receive strike benefits.

I do not believe in the practice of employers, under the guise of "sacredness" of contracts for personal services, preventing anyone from approaching their employees to ask them to quit work and to join with fellow workers for the protection and the promotion of the interests of all; I do not believe in the practice of a judge issuing orders restraining persons from doing that which they have a lawful right to do and the practice of a judge punishing them for violating such unlawful orders.

BETTERMENT OF HUMAN LIFE.

The House is now considering a bill for the reform of abuses of the injunctive process. Those abuses American workers have felt more keenly than all other citizens. In the name of justice they demand the speedy enactment of law adequate to prevent future perversions of justice. They demand not only that organizations of workers be deemed lawful, but that they be accorded the legal right to such normal and necessary activities as will make organizations real forces for the betterment of human life.

Associated effort for self-help is the only protection upon which the workers can rely. It has done more than any other force for the uplift of the masses of our country. It will do more as the way is opened to greater opportunities. The workers demand these opportunities in the name of justice and humanity. They demand legislation that shall exempt them from the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act and protect them from abuses of the injunctive process. [Applause.]

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. CARLIN. I ask that the gentleman use some of his time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, evidently no argument is necessary before this House to secure the passage of this amendment. I wish, however, expressing my own personal views, to declare myself in favor of this amendment, not that I believe that this amendment contains all that should be added to this section, but because I understand the proposed amendment has the approval of the labor organizations of this country, and I assume the leaders of such organizations have carefully examined the amendment and are satisfied with its provisions.

Mr. Chairman, if there be a conflict between capital and labor—and, in a broad sense, there should not be—but if there be or is such a conflict, so far as I am concerned, after the most careful and deliberate consideration on my part, I propose to place myself on the side of labor. [Applause.]

Because, gentleman, I believe that on that side lie the interests of my country and of humanity. The great bulk of the citizens of this country are wage earners. The great bulk of the wealth produced in this country is distributed through the payment of wages. Labor organizations have their imperfections, no doubt. But, on the whole, I believe such organizations are beneficial to the country and helpful to all wage earners. Such organizations may be at times subject justly to criticism. But what organization of human beings is not subject to criticism? But with all their defects I believe it would be a calamity for this Nation if such organizations should cease to exist. In my judgment it would be a misfortune to the country if through our national laws our labor organizations should be hampered and hindered in all their legitimate work. So far as we can aid them by national legislation in their great purpose of shortening the hours of labor, increasing wages, and improving conditions under which labor is performed we should do so, and by so doing I believe we are rendering a patriotic service to our country. There are many who think legislation favorable to labor organizations means hostility to the great business interests of the country. This is not true. The intelligent wage earners of the United States know that, after all, their own welfare depends upon the prosperity of business. They know that business must prosper or labor will suffer. Employees know that any serious loss to employers will react unfavorably upon employees. So that, after all, I believe the business interests of this country are really safe in the hands of labor. We have in the United States the most intelligent workingmen in the world. They know that their share of wealth must come through wages paid; that good wages can not be paid by business concerns that are unprofitable. So that I can not think that our labor organizations are hostile to business or are dangerous to industrial peace. More than that, the very strength of this Nation, the perpetuity of this Republic, depend largely upon the attitude of the wage earners of this country toward our institutions and our flag. I believe the National Government should by its legislation indicate its friendliness toward the labor of this country, so that the great labor organizations of this country and the rank and file of the army of wage earners of this Nation who are not in organized labor will have a friendly attitude to our institutions, to our country, and to our flag; so that in time of war, in time of stress, in time of danger, the great body of wage earners, constituting the masses of this Nation, will remain true and loyal to the flag of our country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy only a minute or two in speaking on this amendment.

I desire to call attention to a peculiar situation. This morning I read in one of the newspapers that labor claims for this proposed amendment one meaning while the administration claims an entirely different meaning. It seems to me that we ought to write the amendment so that it will not be open to dispute as to its meaning. If this amendment is intended to legalize the secondary boycott, this House ought to know it. If it is intended, as I believe it is claimed by those who present it on this floor, simply to legalize the existence of these organizations, I do not believe there is anyone here who would be opposed to it. It is very unfortunate that an amendment should be proposed to this bill which must of necessity go into the courts after it becomes a law before anybody will know definitely just what it means. It looks as though it has been drawn to deceive somebody. It is perfectly plain that if those who drew it intended to write a clear exemption of labor into this statute, they could easily have found the language. It is unfortunate, and it seems to me that before we close the discussion on this paragraph some proposition ought to be submitted that no one can dispute. We ought to know what we are voting for. [Applause.]

I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, while I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina that this amendment only expresses the consensus of the best opinion as to what the law now is, I am still of the opinion that it is well to put in the statute an affirmative declaration which can not be misunderstood. Under the Sherman law as it now stands a labor organization is perfectly legal, and a peaceable strike or peaceable picketing is perfectly legal, under the decisions of a majority of the courts.

Mr. Chairman, I had occasion not long ago to advise a committee of a labor organization who waited upon me. They were engaged in a strike against the Harriman and Illinois Central lines. They represented a body of machinists. They told me they were threatened by the attorneys of those railroads with a prosecution under the Sherman law. I advised them that the Sherman law had no application to the situation as it existed under their strike, for their strike was a perfectly peaceable one. They had committed no violence. They had threatened no one with violence, but had simply expressed by their action their right as organized members of a fraternity to stop work peaceably. I told the men not to be alarmed; that no prosecution would be begun, and to tell the railroad attorneys to go ahead if they desired, but in the end they would meet an action for damages for malicious prosecution. But the men were not prosecuted. There was no action begun against them, nor was anything done under the Sherman law. Yet there is, as I think, some necessity for this provision, for the reason that there have been isolated decisions by the lower Federal courts holding that the mere organization of a body of laborers for the purpose of maintaining or raising wages is contrary to law. There have been some indictments under the Sherman law, and one is now pending, as I understand it, in Colorado. It is true that the reason has been given that in the particular instances to which the law has been so applied that violence had been committed or attempted. But there should be some definite standard, and the section as amended fixes one, and labor organizations which confine themselves to legitimate purposes need not fear the law.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I shall support this amendment. It distinguishes between the man and the dollar, between the ore and the man who digs the ore, between the throttle and the man at the throttle. It distinguishes between labor and the products of labor. It is a just distinction, which was written before the formation of government upon the tablet of nature by Almighty God. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the plainest statement of the intention of the committee in regard to the amendment under consideration. If the committee intended to exempt labor and farmers' organizations from the operation of the Sherman antitrust law, why does it not say so?

I am not a lawyer; just a common layman, without ability to give a judicial opinion, but I do know what is meant when it is stated that the Sherman antitrust law shall not apply to certain organizations.

Let us state the case as plainly as possible, so there will be no doubt in the mind of anyone as to what it is intended to do. If these organizations are to be exempted, let us say so; if they are not, let us say that. Do not let us quibble nor leave it to courts to upset the intention of Congress in this matter.

Mr. CARLIN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRUMBAUGH].

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that personally I favor the plainest and most explicit declaration possible in behalf of the rights of labor. I think this is best for both sides concerned and interested in this matter. I shall vote for this amendment, because I understand it meets with the approval of labor organizations that have carefully examined it, and at the same time it is considered fair by those who employ labor. In fact, I am informed that the amendment is the result of mutual understanding between both labor leaders and employers of labor, and I have been advised and assured personally by labor leaders in whom I place every confidence that the amendment is satisfactory to labor organizations and friends of labor everywhere.

Mr. Chairman, it is gratifying, indeed, to those of us who have been the friends and champions of labor and labor laws for years, both here and elsewhere, and who at the same time have wanted this great advance made in justice not only to labor but to honest employers of labor as well, to see this great question settled in this sensible, reasonable, amicable manner, in this spirit of fairness to all concerned, and thus see this tardy justice done to the great cause of labor, upon which the prosperity and happiness of the people as a whole and the growth and grandeur of our great Nation must ever rest. No nation can be or ought to be strong and great and secure that does not respect and honor its laboring men and women. The most honorable and dignified thing in all this world for any man or woman is honest labor, whether of hand or heart or brain; for did not the Nazarene Carpenter, the Christ Himself, give to honest labor a halo of honor and dignity that no rank of birth or wealth can equal or enjoy?

Extremely gratifying to me, indeed, is it to see this great Democratic Congress keep and redeem our promises made to labor and labor organizations; to see this Democratic Congress place the man above the dollar and to be able to hear the heartbeats of humanity above the clinking of the coin of commercialized wealth. [Applause.]

No other Congress in 50 years has done so much by law to assist and relieve labor. By our tariff law we take the hand of trust monopoly on the high prices of the necessaries of life out of the pockets of the laboring man. By our currency bill we protect his little saving in the banks from the panicky gambling heretofore pastime operations of the money power. By this amendment we take the hands of those who would oppress and tyrannize off of the throat of labor and let it breathe free.

Mr. Chairman, personally I want to say that I am proud to have come from the ranks of laboring people myself. I know by years of personal experience their life of toil, and I can sympathize with their struggles and needs. Laboring men seldom ask for aught but their just deserts, and the Good Book says that the laborer is worthy of his hire and condemns those who would oppress the laborer in his way.

I propose now, as I always have in the past, to stand for all just demands in labor's interests.

I congratulate my friends and fellows, the laborers, on this advance, which is the promise, I trust, of the dawning of a better day wherein labor shall receive its just recompense of reward, wherein life shall be sweeter, labor lighter, and the world for all a better place to live upon. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. CARLIN. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I want to extend my sincere congratulations to the committee that has reported this bill and that has now proffered the amendment which will perfect section 7. It is not too much to say that by this single measure, with its complementary sections on injunctions and contempts, by one single stroke of the legislative hand more is being done in our country to rectify the judicial status of the great toiling masses than has ever been accomplished in our history before. [Applause.] Nor does this mean violent or radical treatment of the relations of labor and capital.

This section 7, taken with its complementary sections, places the American workman where the British workman was placed by Parliament in 1906. Their experience shows that property will be as safe, the rights of employers will be as secure, if this measure is enacted into a law, which I predict will become known as the great magna charta of American workmen. [Applause.]

Everybody understands that section 7 would have been written into the Sherman Act in 1890 had there been any thought of the application since made of that great act. Everybody knows that Congress at that time had no thought of legislating with regard to the relations of employers and employees. I challenge contradiction for that statement. If Congress had ever intended to legislate upon these relations and saw fit to do what the States may well do and are doing, for it is their subject matter and not a Federal subject matter—prescribing penalties for individual wrongs when committed—I challenge the gentlemen of this House to say that Congress would have ever said to the toiler: "If you overstep the line and commit a tort, you shall be subject to threefold damages." That was the natural sentence to have pronounced on the trust, an outlaw organization that sought to suck up all the commercial profit and power of the Republic. That is a sentence—the sentence of outlawry—that never can be pronounced, now or in the future, on a peaceful organization of workingmen. [Applause.]

I know there is some misapprehension. Some honest people are inclined to think that this section may mean a species of class legislation. They commit the error of considering labor as a commodity, a natural error inspired by the circumstances under which the price of labor, unfortunately, is sometimes determined by the iron laws of the market. But there is this distinction between labor and a barrel of oil, a commodity: Labor is never in truth a commodity; labor can never under our institutions be property, either before the court or before the legislature. Under our Constitution, property in human beings has forever ceased. While a barrel of oil is not only a commodity in the market, it is a commodity before the courts; it is a commodity before the legislature. The legal attribute of a commodity is property; but the legal attribute of the workingman is citizenship. A different principle of sociology and justice apply to these two subject matters when they are before Congress or before the courts. The rules that are rationally applicable to property can seldom be justly applied to the man. I thank you, gentlemen, for your attention. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN].

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to read into the RECORD two editorials, one from the Globe and Commercial Advertiser, of New York, of Thursday, May 28, and another from the Springfield Daily Republican, of Thursday, May 28.

They are as follows:

THE SO-CALLED LABOR EXEMPTION.

The Globe is pleased to note a subsidence of the determination to misrepresent and to appeal to prejudice against an explicit recognition by Congress of the right of labor organizations to exist. A year and two years ago, when the issue was up, the public was confused by untrue statements, oracularly made, that the labor unions were browbeating Congress into exempting them from prosecution under the Sherman law. A reading of the proposed amendment to the Sherman law revealed the misrepresentation, but few could be induced to read it. It became almost a truism in certain quarters that the wicked labor unions were asking the special privilege of committing crimes at pleasure.

But last night the Evening Post, which has been one of the worst offenders in the past, published in its Washington correspondence a fair summary of the proposed amendment. And this morning the Times, which has formerly raged against the black horror of authorizing the commission of crimes, acknowledges in its editorial that the law gives to the unions no greater rights than are already theirs under a reasonable reading of Chief Justice White's "rule of reason." Only the Sun remains to cry out in the old, lusty way against the alleged tyranny of Gompers and his associates.

If labor organizations now have the right to exist and to carry out the legitimate objects of the association, then the amendment is merely declaratory of the present law, and in the nature of surplusage. But in the Danbury hat case the Supreme Court used language that suggested that perhaps labor unions are per se illegal under the Sherman law—that it is an illegal restraint of trade for men to agree to work for similar wages or to quit work in a concerted way. Several Federal district attorneys have threatened and one or two have actually begun proceedings for the dissolution of labor unions as involving restraint of trade. Their right to exist being thus called in question, it is not strange that the labor organizations ask for an affirmative recognition.

There is no license to commit crime. Talk along this line is bosh. If a labor organization violates the Sherman law, it will be open to prosecution under the Sherman law. But its members may not be sent to jail for merely belonging. This may be the law now; but doubt has been thrown on the right of men to combine together for the joint selling of their labor, and it is worth while to have the doubt removed.

THE LABOR AMENDMENT.

Organized labor by no means gets what it demanded in the labor amendments to the Federal antitrust law now under consideration by the lower branch of Congress. But it has secured something from the majority party. Complete and unqualified exemption from the operation of the Sherman Act was asked for on the lines indicated by the bill introduced and championed by the late Senator Bacon, of Georgia, a conservative of the older school, it is interesting to note. Senator Bacon always stoutly maintained that no intention whatever existed on the part of the Congress that passed the Sherman Act in 1890 to bring labor organizations within its prohibitions, but the courts did what Congress did not do by interpretations of the law. Such is the strong belief of many of the students of that legislation. Yet none of the leading political parties has ventured to indorse fully the exemption demand. The Democrats in 1908 and 1912 inserted in their national platform:

"The expanding organization of industry makes it essential that there should be no abridgment of the right of wage earners and producers to organize for the protection of wages and the improvement of labor conditions to the end that such labor organizations and their members should not be regarded as illegal combinations in restraint of trade."

That idea, so far as it goes, if carried into effect, would insure exemption for labor organizations from the antitrust law, but it has to do only with the "restraint-of-trade" prohibition contained in the act. The exemption should surely go that far, if no further, and the Republican is glad to see that the amendment said to be agreed to by the House leaders and the radical labor representatives in that body reads as follows:

"That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations, orders, or associations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; and such organizations, orders, or associations, or the members thereof, shall not be construed or held to be illegal combinations in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws."

The reason why the amendment of the antitrust act, to that length at least, is desirable and even necessary is that section 1 of the act is so comprehensive in its scope that the courts are at liberty to regard anything in the form of a combination that has the effect of "restraining trade" as a criminal conspiracy. Logically speaking, there is no reason whatever why the Federal courts should not outlaw strikes of wage earners as conspiracies whenever those strikes, as they often do, have the effect of restraining trade or commerce among the States. It is well known that down until recent times the lawful right to strike, to quit work in concert, was not recognized. The right to withdraw labor power, not individually but collectively, is the very foundation of the modern labor movement. It corresponds to the churchman's constitutional right to the free exercise of his religion. The Sherman antitrust law menaces the right to strike, and therefore the demand for the amendment of the law is justified.

That labor's fears are well founded concerning the gradual extension of the scope of the law of 1890 to prohibits acts whose lawfulness had been recognized in England and America, after generations of struggle, as a necessary concession to labor's moral right to improve its economic condition under the wage system appears convincingly in the several suits brought under the statute in recent years against labor organizations. Suits of that character are now pending in the courts. One Federal judge in Louisiana ruled that a strike to force employers to enter into a joint agreement with union labor was in restraint of trade under the antitrust act. Union labor in the West Virginia coal fields has been lately haled into the Federal courts accused of conspiracy under the same law. A clearer legal definition, a more specific legal understanding of labor's rights under Federal law in initiating and maintaining strikes and other acts of industrial warfare—so long as that sort of warfare is permitted and even legalized under our system—becomes most desirable. The extreme comprehensiveness of the Sherman Act, so much admired by those who imagine that it is the last word in legislation affecting monopoly, may become a danger the moment the law is permitted to run beyond those "unlawful restraints and monopolies" in interstate commerce which it was chiefly designed to curb.

Violent protests against these labor amendments to the antitrust law emanate from several quarters. It is urged most vehemently that they grossly violate the principle of equality of all people before the law. But the truth is that when wage earners won the right to quit work in concert they were necessarily conceded an exceptional status under the old conspiracy laws. "Inherent differences that exist" should be "recognized by the laws and the courts as well as by reason," says Samuel Gompers, and Samuel Gompers, for once at least, tells the truth with much clearness and force. There are inherent differences between combinations of wage earners and combinations of corporations seeking to monopolize industries. So, too, there are inherent differences between industrial corporations and railroad corporations, which should be recognized by the laws. The Federal antitrust law is unsatisfactory; it will never be wholly successful in its working until it is confined to its proper field. Railroads should be exempt from it; so should labor. But that is not saying that railroads and labor should be exempt from all law. There will be law enough to go around, everyone should believe.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word in concluding the debate on this great subject. The Democratic Party is now about to fulfill its promise made to the great labor organizations and the farmers' organizations of this country. [Applause.] We have decided that flesh and bone shall no longer be considered a commodity in the sense of manufactured products. We have decided that human beings shall be placed above things. We have decided that men with consciences and minds shall be recognized before the law as such, and that those that labor with their hands and hearts for wages shall be separated from the things which they produce. [Applause.]

We have gone as far as we can consistently and rightfully go under our Constitution. A step further, in my judgment, toward the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] and the gentleman representing the Progressives on this floor would be in the very teeth of the Constitution itself, and while they cry out that they want to do more for labor they know or ought to know that what they can do for labor organizations must be done under our Constitution and not in violation thereof. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MURDOCK and Mr. THOMAS) there were 207 ayes and no noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

The Clerk reads as follows:

Strike out all of section 7 down to and including the word "thereof" in line 10 and insert the following:

"The provisions of the antitrust law shall not apply to agricultural, labor, consumers, fraternal, or horticultural orders or associations."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. If that amendment is adopted, it leaves the amendment by the gentleman from North Carolina that we have just adopted in the bill, does it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky seems to strike out the paragraph as amended.

Mr. BARTLETT. It strikes it out down to and including the word "thereof," so it would not strike out the amendment just adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first paragraph of section 7 as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, this amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS], if adopted, does not affect the amendment that we have just adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it strikes out the whole of the first paragraph of section 7 as amended.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then this amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, if adopted, would take the place of the paragraph as it has been amended?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the opinion of the Chair. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the first paragraph of section 7 as amended and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The provisions of the antitrust laws shall not apply to agricultural, labor, consumers', fraternal, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, it is well enough, as a distinguished gentleman from Georgia at one time said on the floor of this House, to stop and see just where we are at. Courts in construing laws always construe the law as a whole. Let us read and construe this section as amended, and see just where we are at. Section 7 provides that nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural, or horticultural organizations or associations instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit. As amended it will read:

Labor, fraternal, agricultural, or consumers' organizations shall not be held or construed to be illegal combinations in restraint of trade under the antitrust law.

What labor organization? What agricultural organization? Construing this law as a whole, only those organizations which do not have capital stock or are not conducted for profit. Those are the only two classes that this bill as amended applies to. If a labor organization is conducted for profit, this amendment does not apply to that organization; if a labor organization has capital stock, this amendment does not apply to such an organization, because, reading and construing the law as amended, in its entirety, only organizations which have no capital stock and which are not conducted for profit are exempt under this amendment.

What is the object, the very primary object of a labor organization? It is profit. Profit how? To advance and increase the wages of its members. That is a profit to them, and consequently that amendment can not apply to such organizations, because you have got to construe this law in its entirety, and no court will construe it piecemeal. What is the object of the farmers' organization? It is to obtain better prices for their products, and that is a profit to the farmer, and if that is a profit to the farmer then your amendment does not apply, because your amendment can apply only to those organizations which are named in the body of this bill. This bill limits it to those organizations which do not have capital stock and are not conducted for profit.

I voted for this amendment. I do not think there is anything in it. I do not believe that it changes in one iota the original text of the bill. Gentlemen have said that they desire above all things to exempt these organizations from the operations of the antitrust laws. If you do, why do you not do it? My amendment is plain. It is concise; it will not take any court to construe it, because it provides that these antitrust laws shall not apply to these associations, and that is what the farmers and the laborers of this country want; and if you want a clear, clean-cut exemption, vote for this amendment of mine and you will get it; otherwise you will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk, as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 7 by striking out all of the first paragraph before the Webb amendment after the word "shall," in line 4, page 24, and insert the following in lieu thereof: "apply to trade-unions or other labor organizations organized for the purpose of regulating wages, hours of labor, or other conditions under which labor is to be performed, nor to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture, made with a view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products; nor to fraternal or consumers' organizations, orders, or associations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit."

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment will accomplish the purpose designed by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS], but it will also leave in the Webb amendment, so that those who are really interested in getting an exemption of these organizations in this law will have the benefit of both of those ideas. There are many gentlemen on this floor who are not in favor of this idea, and there are many gentlemen who are in favor of the idea of really exempting these organizations; and I say again that if you are in favor of exempting these organizations specifically from the operation of these laws, vote for this amendment. If you are not, do not vote for this amendment, because this makes it plain and unmistakable in its meaning.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I take it that the Committee of the Whole has perfected section 7 to its satisfaction when it adopted the amendment which was just adopted by a vote of 207 to nothing. These amendments offered in addition thereto have been discussed, and I understand that the sentiment of the House is that section 7 should be amended as it was amended a moment ago, and no further.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has heard the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky and that offered by the gentleman from Michigan, and we have just had a vote which shows a remarkable state of affairs, that every Member present is in favor of the exemption of organized labor from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. This is a matter which has been in controversy for 24 years, and what I want to ask the gentleman is this: In view of this remarkable unanimity, does not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky and that offered by the gentleman from Michigan go much further than the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. WEBB. I could not say it goes much further; but why should the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] want a division on the floor of the House when there is no division as between labor and capital and the farmers. All of us are united on this.

Mr. MURDOCK. From the debate I will say to the gentleman that there is a great difference of opinion as to just what his amendment does. I do not think, and I do not think the gentleman thinks, that it goes as far as that amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] and that amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD], and I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina this, and then I will take my seat: Did the Committee on the Judiciary intend the Webb amendment to exempt organized labor from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. WEBB. It certainly does exempt their existence and operation if organized for mutual help and without profit.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does it say anything——

Mr. WEBB. We wanted to make it plain that no labor organization or farmers' organization organized for mutual help without profit should be construed to be a combination in restraint of trade or a conspiracy under the antitrust laws. Now, I will say frankly to my friend that we never intended to make any organizations, regardless of what they might do, exempt in every respect from the law. I would not vote for any amendment that does do that. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. If the labor organization goes beyond the province of mutual help, then is it subject to the Sherman antitrust laws?

Mr. WEBB. If it violates the law, it is. Of course it is an organization subject to the law, and I ask if my friend from Kansas would vote to exempt it from all laws?

Mr. MURDOCK. I would vote to exempt it from being confined under the antitrust laws to mere inactive existence.

Mr. WEBB. But the gentleman would not vote to exempt it and nobody else from all laws?

Mr. MURDOCK. I understand that, but I would give strikers the right to peaceful assemblage.

Mr. WEBB. We give them that right in this bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. I doubt it very much.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman can not doubt it if he will read section 18.

Mr. MURDOCK. Section 18 of this bill confines its jurisdiction to employers and employees. Strikers are not employees. The relation of employer and employee ceases when employees strike.

Mr. WEBB. I do not know how my friend——

Mr. MURDOCK. That is the way I read section 18.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman should read it like the lawyers of the labor unions of the country read it, and I believe they understand it. We expressly provide in section 18 that labor organizations can strike, that they can persuade others to strike, that they can pay strike benefits, that they can have peaceful assemblages, and a great many other things. That is their bill of rights and they are satisfied with it, and what is it that dissatisfies my friend from Kansas if the labor people of this country, if the farmers of the country, and the capitalists of the country are satisfied with it? [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I will tell the gentleman why I am not satisfied. The gentleman from North Carolina and the Judiciary Committee have left out the same words, "shall not apply to," which have been carried in all amendments for the last 24 years and put into the amendment language that must be construed by the courts and construed how heaven only knows and the gentleman from North Carolina does not know.

Mr. WEBB. That is what was said about "restraint of trade," "reasonable doubt," and a thousand expressions you can not exactly define, but you have got to leave something to the courts. This is what labor wants, and I think my friend from Kansas ought to be satisfied.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if it was not the fact that the representatives of the organizations of labor in this city who represent the great national organizations and the representatives of the great national farmers' organizations had not gone over this amendment and if they did not state this is exactly what they wanted?

Mr. WEBB. That is my understanding, and of course everybody so understands it.

Mr. KEATING. And if the representatives of labor and the representatives of the great farmers' organizations have not some kick coming to them, what does the gentleman want us to do now? [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. That is my understanding.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not know——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, just to ask a question of the gentleman, because if these amendments are voted down, as possibly they may be, I wish to offer an amendment which I have carefully prepared on the question of farmers' organizations. The gentleman said that the representatives of the farmers' associations have agreed to this amendment. I ask him to name one representative of any farmers' association that agreed to this amendment. I have received telegrams from farmers' associations protesting most vehemently against them. Now, will the gentleman name one representative from these farmers' associations——

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that I have never heard of a single farmer objecting to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. NELSON. Has the gentleman seen a single representative of the farmers' associations in reference to this amendment?

Mr. HENRY. If the gentleman will permit, I will try to answer that question.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not chairman of that committee.

Mr. WEBB. What is the question the gentleman wants to ask?

Mr. NELSON. Name a single representative of any farmers' association who agreed to this amendment.

Mr. WEBB. I can not name a single representative of farmers' associations who is against it.

Mr. HENRY. I submitted this proposed language to the Farmers' Union of Texas and asked if it would satisfy the farmers, and they wrote back it was entirely satisfactory.

Mr. NELSON. Did the gentleman point out the effect of the language, "and not conducted for profit"——

Mr. HENRY. Yes; and I pointed that out and asked for suggestions, and they said they had no suggestions to make, because it was as plain as the English language could make it.

Mr. NELSON. Did the gentleman point out that it exempted no organization except those who came together for mutual discussion of methods, and that farmers' organizations that were conducted for the purpose of marketing their product should not be exempted?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit? Do I understand that Congress has abdicated its province and right of legislation and has gone into a searching committee to find out what certain organizations want, without any regard to the merits of the proposition?

Mr. NELSON. I was speaking of the statement of the chairman that farmers' organizations were not opposed to it, whereas I have received a number of telegrams from farmers' organizations protesting against it.

As soon as this amendment is disposed of, I wish to offer an amendment that, I think, will meet the approval of farmers' organizations.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. I have no protests filed with the committee. The committee received no protests against the provisions of this section which was put in the bill as section 7. I am reliably informed by gentlemen on the floor that the general counsel of the Farmers' Union very heartily indorses this amendment which the gentleman has just voted for and which seems to be acceptable to labor as well.

Mr. GARDNER Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Wisconsin has concluded——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, has my time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it has not.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the gentleman that in the committee I filed protests from organizations of farmers against the language that was then proposed to be inserted in the law and this new section, in effect, does the very same thing against which they protested at that time.

Mr. Chairman, I yield now, and shall offer an amendment and speak in my own time later on.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I take the negative of the motion to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Do I understand the gentleman from Kansas to portray the position of the Progressive Party in saying that he advocates the exemption of cotton planters' associations and woolgrowers' associations and associations gotten together for the purpose of enhancing the prices of the staples of life from the operation of the antitrust laws?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have made no statement about the growers of cotton or the growers of wool, and I have not spoken for anybody but myself this morning. But I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I am in favor of a law here which will directly, in terms, exempt farmers' organizations and labor unions from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law.

I do so because I believe, in the first instance, that labor is not a commodity, and because, in the second instance, I believe that agriculture is so highly individualized that it is in no sense a menace to society; and I believe that the Sherman antitrust law was passed not to reach the farmers' organizations, and not to reach the labor unions, but to reach monopoly, which thrives, by the way, more in the gentleman's district than it does in mine. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Possibly it is a fact that it does; but if you exempt cotton planters' associations and if you exempt woolgrowers' associations, and if you exempt these associations gotten together for the purpose of enhancing the cost of the necessaries of life, as is proposed by the Progressive Party in the proposition which has been brought forward by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD], you will find that in the gentleman's district—have I the attention of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. You will find that in the gentleman's district in Kansas there will be more injury done to the people of the United States than in my district.

Mr GREGG rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is not debate exhausted on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr MANN. I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD].

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not in order. We have already that amendment in the third degree.

Mr. GREGG. I move, then, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MANN. That is an amendment in the fourth degree.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to talk for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I shall not object to this request, but I shall to other requests. The gentleman will get a chance later on to speak on these amendments.

Mr. GREGG. I wish to speak right on this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, this provision, section 7 of the bill, even after the adoption of the Webb amendment, which was intended to improve the section, exempts from the operation of the antitrust laws only such labor, agricultural, and horticultural organizations, orders, or associations as have no capital stock or are not conducted for profit.

Now, if we are going to grant this exemption to the labor and agricultural orders and organizations, and everybody here seems willing to grant it, we should do it in such broad and unequivocal language as to give them the full benefit, which I am afraid this provision as written does not do.

Labor orders are organized not only to improve the hours and conditions of labor but also to increase their wages to the highest reasonable rate and to maintain them at that standard. This is right, and what I want them to have. I fear that under this section the courts will construe that the organization to increase and maintain their wages is for profit, and therefore that they are not exempt from the antitrust laws. Should the courts so hold, the labor organizations will not have received any benefit from this provision. I want to make it so plain that there can be no mistake that they are exempt.

Again, suppose that in the future it should become necessary for labor organizations in the conduct of their business to issue capital stock to raise money needed in their business; in that event they would at once become subject to the antitrust laws. We are not legislating only for the present and present conditions, but for the future and future conditions. We should not so hem them in that in the future they may not adopt such methods of conducting their business as may seem best to them.

What is the object of farmers' organizations? One of the main objects is by cooperation to secure the best market and price for their products. Should they agree not to sell their cotton, wheat, corn, or other products at less than a given price, I fear the courts would hold that they were an organization for profit, and under this provision as now worded they would not be exempt from prosecution and punishment under the antitrust laws. Thus would be destroyed one of their main objects for organization. I am not willing to subject them to any such danger.

Again, suppose an agricultural or horticultural organization in my county or anywhere else should, in addition to their other purposes, wish to organize for the purpose of erecting a warehouse and issue stock for that purpose, a thing which they have done in some cases, in order to have some place in which to store their products, while they are holding them for more favorable conditions in the market. Most of them are people of small means and not able by voluntary contributions to build warehouses, and if they should issue capital stock to build one, they at once, under the provisions of this section as worded, would become subject to the operations of the antitrust laws. Thus you force them either to expose their products to the weather or to rent warehouses possibly at exorbitant rent. For one I am not willing to do this, but want them to have the right by issuing stock or otherwise to build and own their own warehouses. If we are going to do anything for them, let us do it ungrudgingly.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] meets and obviates all the objections which I have pointed out, and I shall therefore vote for it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to ask the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], if he will yield to me, a question, in view of the statement he made a while ago. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] is not here. What are you going to ask him?

Mr. THOMAS. Wait, and you will find out. He is here.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] a few moments ago, in interrogating the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], stated that this amendment is just what organized labor wanted. Is it not a fact that organized labor wanted to exempt organized labor entirely from the operation of the antitrust law, such as is not here offered, and was not this Webb amendment simply the result of a compromise?

Mr. KEATING. If I had the time, Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to answer that question.

Mr. THOMAS. That could be answered by yes or no.

Mr. KEATING. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS]——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I object to the gentleman's making a speech in my time. I simply asked him a question.

Mr. KEATING. I have to answer the question clearly. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] was considered by the representatives of organized labor, and they decided that the proposition submitted by Mr. WEBB, of North Carolina, was a stronger proposition and more beneficial to labor organizations than the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS. Is it not a fact that the Webb amendment was accepted by organized labor only after they came to the conclusion that they could not get the amendment that I submitted?

Mr. KEATING. The statement which I made—and I made it very deliberately, because it was repeated to me since this House met, by a leader of organized labor, who is qualified and authorized to speak for organized labor—was that the amendment as submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] was better, from the viewpoint of organized labor, than the Thomas amendment, which had been previously considered by the labor leaders. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Division, Mr. Chairman!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 98.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have that amendment read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the first paragraph of section 7 as amended and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The provisions of the antitrust laws shall not apply to agricultural, labor, consumers', fraternal, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations."

The question being taken, the Chariman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. THOMAS. Let us have a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 79.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. THOMAS and Mr. WEBB.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 105.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. NELSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Washington withhold his amendment. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON], a member of the committee, will first be recognized.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the paragraph as amended by inserting after the word "profit" and before the words "or to forbid," in line 8, page 24, the following "or of cooperative agricultural associations formed for the purpose of buying more cheaply, and of marketing their products to better advantage," so as to make the first paragraph of this section read:

"That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural or horticultural organizations, orders or associations, instituted for the purpose of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or of cooperative agricultural associations formed for the purpose of buying more cheaply and marketing their products to better advantage, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations, orders, or associations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, orders, or associations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, this House has now done justice to labor organizations, and I am very glad of it. As a member of the committee I earnestly did all I could to secure this result in our report from the committee. I am not going into any argument on this feature of it. I discussed it fully in the report made from the committee and in the speech I made to the House.

I now want to appeal to the House to do justice to the farmers' associations of our country. I want to say to you that this section does nothing for the farmers except to permit them to come together to discuss better methods of farming. Of course, such organizations never were under the Sherman antitrust law; but the language of this section is carefully selected, and in defining the associations that are exempt it says that if they have capital stock or are conducted for profit, then it will not take them from under the ban of the law. This does not legalize organizations of farmers cooperatively buying supplies or selling their products, but may have the effect of clearly rendering them illegal.

Now, gentlemen, I want to impress upon you the importance of business cooperation on the part of farmers in this country and in foreign countries, and at the risk of tiring you a little I wish to call your attention to this voluminous report——

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Would not the effect of the permission to organize cooperative associations be to repeal the word "profit" and the words "capital stock" in the clause as perfected up to this time?

Mr. NELSON. Let me say to the gentleman that as I drew this amendment first, to get at this difficulty I struck out the words "not having capital stock and not conducted for profit"; but those words may be necessary with reference to other organizations that might pretend that they were fraternal, or horticultural, or something of that kind. So I have amended this and made a separate classification, specifically exempting agricultural associations that are cooperative, but leaving in the limitation "not having capital stock and not conducted for profit" as to these other organizations.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I will ask the gentleman whether the qualification he desires to make would not open the gate to commercial organizations that the antitrust laws were originally designed to prevent?

Mr. NELSON. I think not. They would have to be shown to be bona fide agricultural associations, and, of course, any sham would be exposed in court.

Now, I wish to call attention to this volume, Senate Document No. 214, Agricultural Cooperation and Rural Credit in Europe. It contains nearly 1,000 pages of testimony taken by a double commission, an American commission consisting of delegates from various States and from Canada, and a United States commission. On the American commission were men appointed from nearly all the States and from the Provinces of Canada, and there was a United States commission consisting of Members of this House and the Senate. Both commissions have made extensive reports which have been printed as public documents. I wish briefly to read a few extracts from the very excellent report of the American commission, which will show you what this movement is.

The person who goes among European farmers for the first time will be impressed with the fact that cooperation is the most important thing about European agriculture. It is, of course, not true that all the farmers band themselves together, and yet that is a very common way of doing farm business. Farmers buy together, sell together, borrow and lend together, insure together, own machinery together, and in some cases actually carry on a farm together. There are 25,000 cooperative societies of various kinds in Germany alone. It is really astonishing to see the extent to which the farmers, particularly the small farmers, have accomplished results which would have been impossible if each farmer had depended upon himself.

The last sentence is the key to much of the success of the European farmer. He found that alone he could do nothing; together with his fellows he could do a great deal. He proved that one and one are more than two; at least, that two people who work together can accomplish a great deal more than two people who work separately. Hence was formed a habit of doing collectively what farmers had been doing singly and alone, and it was found that as the farmers became accustomed to doing business in this way it proved to be the better way. So gradually at first the method spread. It is important to know that there has been a greater development of cooperation in practically all the European countries in the last 10 years than in any previous period in the history of the movement.

As to the extent of cooperation in Europe, the commission said:

The commission visited a dozen countries, and in every one they found active agricultural cooperation. They were not able to visit some countries, as, for example, Bulgaria. But so far as could be learned, with the possible exception of Turkey, there is not a single country in Europe that has not developed a more or less complete system of agricultural cooperation.

There are many more interesting and striking paragraphs to which I would call your attention, showing the enthusiasm which farmers in Europe are showing for cooperative movement. Time will not permit me to read them.

Speaking of cooperation in the United States, it said:

There is in the United States as a whole considerable successful business cooperation in agriculture. The fruit growers of the West through their selling societies, the grain growers of the Central West in their cooperative elevators, the dairymen of the Northwest in their cooperative creameries, the vegetable growers of the eastern coast in their selling societies, the many mutual insurance societies, and the great numbers of cooperative country stores are doing a successful business and are increasing rapidly.

Again, under the head of "Cooperation and its application to the United States and Canada":

Nevertheless the American farmer should gradually, even if slowly, give up the individual method of doing his business and take up the collective method. Otherwise he can not hold his own except in the comparatively few cases of the very large and well-to-do farmers. The great masses of farmers will soon be perfectly helpless in their business relationships unless they can, by collective effort, place themselves on a par with other business men.

Under the head of "Cooperation and the consumers," the report of the commission says:

The immediate purpose of cooperation is a more effective and less expensive means of distributing the products which the farmer grows to the individuals who finally consume them. At present the farmer gets too little of what the consumer pays and probably the consumer pays more than he ought to. Cooperation between producers and cooperation between consumers ought to increase the price to producers and decrease the cost to consumers.

Now, I wish to call your attention to what some gentlemen said to the committee on this subject, and I am surprised to see that the committee has deliberately ignored their recommendation.

Mr. FARR. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. FARR. Will the Webb amendment prevent the cooperation which the gentleman desires?

Mr. NELSON. Unquestionably; it permits nothing except that the farmers can come together and discuss better methods. The moment that they cooperate they must have shares of stock, and it will be considered that they are conducting the organization for profit, and therefore this section does not apply to them.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Would not it be possible to amend the gentleman's amendment in such a way as to permit a farmers' organization with capital stock, if it so desires, to purchase more cheaply, without opening the door to such an organization to market its products at a price indicative of a combination in restraint of trade?

Mr. NELSON. I think not. But answering that question, the gentleman is fearful of something of which there is no danger of at all to the country. The farmers handle perishable products, and they only hold it over so that it will not be sold when the market is glutted. In the fall they assist each other in reaching a better period of the year. Moreover, the farmers are all hard up, they must have money, they can not hold it over very long. Cooperative marketing merely enables them to find a better market. There is no danger that the farmers of the country could go to such an extent that they would practically monopolize any product.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that cotton and wool are perishable products?

Mr. NELSON. I did not say so.

Mr. GARDNER. Or potatoes?

Mr. NELSON. Are not potatoes perishable products?

Mr. GARDNER. Not particularly.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman from Massachusetts know about potatoes?

Mr. NELSON. It shows what he knows about farming. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to show you what you are doing. President Van Hise says——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. CARLIN. Reserving the right to object, I want to say that we have been discussing this provision for an hour and a half. How much longer does the gentleman want?

Mr. MANN. We would like at least a half an hour on this side.

Mr. CARLIN. Can we agree upon an hour on this paragraph and all amendments thereto?

Mr. MANN. Are there any other amendments to this paragraph on this side?

Mr. BRYAN. I have an amendment, and I want five minutes on it.

Mr. CARLIN. Can we agree that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall be concluded in one hour?

Mr. MANN. We want a half an hour on this amendment, and then the gentleman from Washington wants five minutes on his amendment. That is, on this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. FERRIS. That does not mean the whole section?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the first paragraph of this section and all amendments thereto shall be included in 70 minutes—35 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and 35 minutes by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WILSON of Florida). The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on the first paragraph and amendments thereto close in 70 minutes—35 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and 35 minutes by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARLIN. In that agreement is the 10 minutes which the gentleman from Wisconsin has already used included?

Mr. NELSON. No; that is in addition to what I have used. I was interrupted. I had no chance to read but a small part of what I wished to.

Mr. CARLIN. Then that will give that side 45 minutes and our side 35 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, President Van Hise, of the University of Wisconsin, in speaking about the Sherman law and other things before the Committee on the Judiciary, used this language:

The law that stands in the way of beneficent cooperation of this kind should be modified so as to permit that useful and beneficial cooperation. Now, this rising tide, this pressure, has come upon us so that we have increased our force in the department of economics very materially, and there are always farmers in 15 or 20 communities that want instruction along this line; and in this way the cooperation among farmers is increasing in Wisconsin, Nebraska, California, and in many of the States of the South, and in a few years it will sweep over the entire country and we shall have cooperation among the farmers along all lines in the handling of their products. They have now, in the handling of eggs, an association similar to that for the handling of cranberries in Wisconsin and the citrous-fruit growers of southern California, and under the circumstances it is questionable whether it will be quite so popular a political position to attack cooperation among the farmers.

And I may add that in Wisconsin not only do the cranberry growers cooperate in marketing their products, but the cheese producers, the tobacco raisers, and the potato growers as well.

President Seth Low, of the Civic Federation, an educator, came before the Committee on the Judiciary and, speaking of this very law, which was a ban upon the farmers, he said:

For the last seven years or more I have been carrying on a farm at Bedford Hills in New York. In doing that I very soon became aware of what, I think, is the fundamental problem of the farmer. I am speaking now of the small farmer; it does not affect me at all or other men with capital. But the fundamental problem of the farmer, certainly in the eastern part of the country, and, I suspect, more or less all over the Union, is this: That he buys at retail and sells at wholesale. He has to pay retail prices for everything he gets and then has to take wholesale prices for what he sells. I submit to the committee that there is not another business in the country that can do that. Imagine what would happen to any manufacturer, or any railroad, if they had to pay retail prices for coal and everything that they purchased, and then had to sell their product at the wholesale price of the day. That is the problem with which the farmer is confronted. That was the problem that confronted Denmark and all the European countries. In Europe, where the pressure has been greater, they have solved it through cooperation. They form cooperative societies which have two objects. In the first place, they want to buy together so as to get things at wholesale rates instead of at retail rates; then they want to sell together, so that they can get the benefit of businesslike care in the handling of their products.

Mr. CARLIN. How has that affected the consumer?

Mr. LOW. The consumer does the same thing; he combines to buy direct and at wholesale. As I was going to say to you, however, these cooperative associations on the part of consumers would be absolutely forbidden under this proposed law. The details of cooperation are a little different in almost every country. England is especially notable for these cooperative associations of consumers.

Further on he said:

I do not believe that the farmer ought to have rights that other Americans have not; but I do think they are entitled to form cooperative societies and to agree to give to them all their business for the purpose of purchasing more cheaply together and for the purpose of selling what they produce to better advantage.

* * * * * * *

I think you will recognize the propriety of cooperative associations of consumers as well as of producers; because they certainly have the right, or ought to have the right, to buy together for the purpose of getting things more cheaply, just as producers should have the right to combine together for the purpose of getting better prices for their products. It is very vital, of course, as far as the farmers are concerned and in its effect upon agriculture. You take these gentlemen in Kentucky who raise tobacco; they can not afford to raise tobacco unless they can get an adequate price; and it is the same way with every other producer. You must encourage generous production by enabling the producer to get all that his goods are worth. I come right back to what I said at the beginning, that the trouble with the farmer is that he has to buy at retail and sell at wholesale. That is not reasonable; and cooperative societies are formed to change that, so that under cooperation the small farmer can get his plow as cheaply as the man who has a bigger business. That must be encouraged. When cooperation is thoroughly well developed, a man who produces a small amount of tobacco can get as good a price as the man who raises a great deal of tobacco.

In answer to the argument that the legalization of cooperative organizations among farmers amounts to class legislation Seth Low said:

Now, what I want to point out is that those people do not combine, either the consumers or the farmers, for the purpose of monopoly. Not a single cooperative association aims at monopoly; it aims at something very different. What it wants to do is to enable the small farmer to buy his plow, to buy his fertilizer, and buy his seed at prices that a man with capital has to pay and at no higher prices.

Mr. Low offered the following suggestions to the committee, as to how the bill ought to be amended so as to legalize cooperative buying and selling by organizations of farmers:

I am not a lawyer; and, with all respect to the lawyers who have suggested this language, I think it would be better to change that phraseology so as to permit in terms the formation of such cooperative associations of producers and of consumers, because I think they have, and ought to have, the right to combine in order to buy more cheaply—to buy at wholesale and distribute economically what they produce.

Yes; that would be my suggestion; and I think in that way you would avoid a sort of criticism which I have seen aimed at this bill—that it is class legislation. It is not class legislation if you word it right. I do not think anybody can say it is class legislation to say that laboring men can have the same right to combine for collective bargaining as stockholders have. That is good sense; it is not class legislation. Neither is it class legislation to say that farmers and consumers can combine for the sake of buying more cheaply or selling to greater advantage. That is not class legislation; everybody ought to have that right.

Mr. Chairman, I use the language suggested by Seth Low in this amendment, specifically relieving these cooperative associations from the Sherman law; and that is the only effect the amendment will have.

I have nothing further to add but to repeat that there is a difference between organizations of farmers and monopolies. They are not only different, but are radically opposite. The farm organization is in existence to protect itself from the other. The farm organization is the only way possible for the farmer to protect himself against the oppressions of monopolies and trusts. The farmer deals with his own labor, the product of his life—it is inseparable from him—while the monopolist deals with the capital and credit of others. Monopoly is oppressive, and exacts tributes; but there is not a single case on record where a farm organization has ever practiced oppression upon the consumers, and it is impossible, as I have pointed out. We who have been brought up with farmers, and know what these associations are doing, know that they can not keep their goods; they can not organize so that they can practice oppression.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Does the gentleman think it would be right to allow the cotton farmers of the South or the corn raisers of the West to form corporations whereby they could hold, corner, or monopolize the entire cotton crop or corn crop of the season and compel the world to pay them 25 or 30 or 40 cents a pound for it, or $2 a bushel for corn, and clean up two or three hundred millions of dollars? Does the gentleman think that would be right? I want to get his opinion.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that I have had that query propounded to me by the gentleman before, and this is my candid judgment. The gentleman is conjuring up an imaginary evil.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no.

Mr. NELSON. Wait one moment, until I answer the question. If these cotton growers are like the farmers of the Northwest, and I do not believe they are any more thrifty, they can not afford to hold their crops to any such extent. They must dispose of them within a reasonable time to meet the payments of interest and principal on mortgages, and their tenants oftentimes have the results of their toil to live on during the year. The gentleman takes one specific crop. He can make an exception, but the vast quantity of products of the farm are perishable, and there is not a particle of danger; and I will ask the gentleman if his question does not imply that he is not exempting the farmers from the operation of the Sherman law if they have shares of stock or are conducted for profit?

Mr. WEBB. I do. I do not think they ought to be exempted if they form great corporations for profit.

Mr. NELSON. And the gentleman has not exempted them.

Mr. WEBB. No; and I want to say further that when the farmers or any other class of men form a corporation for profit, to pay dividends, and undertake to monopolize any product in this country they ought to come within the Sherman antitrust law, and I would hate to live in a country where that sort of thing did not prevail, and the farmers in my district view this matter just as I do. They do not want to violate law or good morals. They want a fair deal and yield the same to others.

Mr. NELSON. If you have not taken them out, what sort of farm organizations have you taken out of the ban of the law?

Mr. WEBB. Mutual organizations, such as generally exist to-day among them.

Mr. NELSON. That have no capital?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. But get together to discuss better methods?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. Has the gentleman any metaphysical scissors that will tell us the difference between the man who forms corporations for monopolistic purposes and the man who spins in the factory or the man who raises sheep?

Mr. NELSON. Can the gentleman name a single instance where any cooperative farm organization has practiced oppression upon the country?

Mr. WEBB. That is not the question.

Mr. NELSON. You have denied this right because you have conjured up an imaginary case with the cotton growers.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: I have never had a farmer, whether he raises corn or wheat or oats, ask me to give him a right that he would not have given to every other man in the country. They are an honest set, and ask for no special privileges.

Mr. NELSON. That is what I am insisting upon—not special privilege, but equal rights. You permit capital in any quantity to avail itself of this cooperative principle. They can put their money together, and the money is represented by capital stock, but you deny the farmers of this land the right to do the same.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, we do not at all.

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman says that they can do it, but he knows that they can not very well. The farmer wants to keep his individual farm. He does not want to hold it under a corporation. He wants to be independent, but he wants to cooperate with other independent farmers in buying supplies and in marketing his products without being under the ban of the law—without being a criminal. This you do not permit him to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by my colleague, Mr. NELSON, of Wisconsin, which provides that all cooperative agricultural associations formed for the purpose of buying more cheaply and marketing their products to better advantage shall not be construed to be illegal combinations in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Section 7 of this bill, as it now stands, does not exempt any agricultural, horticultural, or cooperative association that is organized for profit or has capital stock.

A great many, I believe, that voted for the Webb amendment did so with the understanding that it exempted from the operation of the law the bulk of the farm organizations, but the gentleman from North Carolina, who drew the amendment, now admits that it was not so intended and does not exempt any farm organization which has capital stock or which is organized for profit.

So the issue at this time is well defined, and it means that if this law is passed without the Nelson amendment that all farmer organizations and cooperative associations that are organized for profit or have capital stock will be prevented from doing business.

At least 75 per cent of the farmer organizations in the United States are organized for profit and have capital stock.

WISCONSIN FARMERS HIT BY THE PROPOSED LAW.

In Wisconsin all our creameries are organized by farmers and our farmers' cooperative organizations are organized for profit, and have capital stock, and would be prohibited from doing business under this proposed law.

The Sherman antitrust law was never intended to apply to farm organizations, and it was not applied to them until it had been in operation many years.

In the famous Kentucky Tobacco case, where the farmers attempted to pool their tobacco so that they could get a fair price for it, a complaint was made, and they were indicted and fined $3,500. The complaint was instigated by a combination that desired to distract the attention of the country from the Beef Trust and other prosecutions and make the Sherman law unpopular so it would be repealed.

PURPOSE OF ANTITRUST LAWS.

The antitrust laws were enacted for the protection of the people from monopoly; that is, to prevent speculators from cornering a product and exacting a profit from the consumer many times larger than the amount of labor they placed upon it.

Whoever heard of the farmers of the country getting a monopoly on wheat, potatoes, corn, oats, or dairy products? We all know that there is no danger of the producers scattered all over the United States getting a corner on farm products and selling them at exorbitant prices. We know that the farmer has not the capital; that he is not brought in close enough contact with his neighbor a thousand miles away to corner the market; and that the corn grower in Illinois and the corn grower in Iowa, the potato grower in Maine and the potato grower in Wisconsin could not cooperate so as to control the market.

Cooperation among farmers, with the greatest encouragement the different States and the United States can give, can never possibly be more than local cooperation extending over a few townships or counties.

The antitrust laws are enacted to prevent vast aggregates of capital handled by men in the great centers of population cornering the market, controlling the necessities of life, taking advantage of the producers' necessities and buying at a low figure, sometimes below the cost of production, and without changing the product simply by transporting it and storing it, exacting an outrageous profit from the consumer, a profit out of all proportion to the amount of labor expended, and in many instances amounting to more than the total amount received by the real producer.

The Meat Trust is a conspicuous example of the monopoly the antitrust laws are aimed at.

COOPERATION OF FARMERS IN WISCONSIN.

The dairy farmer, through cooperation, is receiving no more than he ought to for his product, but is getting what the consumer is paying less the fair cost of making the butter and cheese and the handling and selling of it. With all other farm products from 35 to 45 per cent of what the consumer pays goes for transporting, handling, and distributing the article.

The cooperative cheese factories in Sheboygan County, one of the great cheese counties in Wisconsin, have an organization for the sale of their cheese, and they are receiving 3 or 4 cents per pound more than the cheese producers in the State of New York, and yet the consumer gets his product cheaper than he does in that State, showing that cooperation of the farmer not only helps him as a producer but also helps the consumer.

The Agricultural Department is expending large sums of money to very good advantage in showing the farmer how he can raise more bushels of grain per acre. In addition to this, it should assist him in marketing his farm products, encouraging him to cooperate, so that he can get a fair profit for the crops that he raises.

There should be no doubt about the law as to it allowing the farmer to cooperate to the fullest extent. It should be so plain that no one would question it, and the adoption of the Nelson amendment will make it so.

The legislative committee from the Society of Equity, of Wisconsin, representing 12,000 farmers, are not satisfied with the proposed law as it now is.

I offer a letter written by Charles A. Lyman, J. Wes. Tubbs, and D. O. Mahoney, legislative committee of the Society of Equity, regarding section 7 of this bill, a similar letter having been sent to the Hon. JOHN M. NELSON:

AMERICAN SOCIETY OF EQUITY,
Madison, Wis., May 23, 1914.

Hon. EDWARD E. BROWNE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our society, 12,000 strong, is counting on you at this time to champion the cause of agriculture in Wisconsin, which has already suffered from tariff legislation, by leading in enacting laws favorable to cooperation.

Be sure to provide in impending antitrust legislation for free and unhampered cooperative action in assembling, grading, standardizing, packing, storing, and marketing farm products.

Agriculture must be permitted to do its business cooperatively and business can not be done without capital.

Would not a general provision permitting all cooperative business activities where all profits above operating expenses are returned to the patrons—producers and consumers—solve the problem? Anyway it must be solved to save our greatest and most important industry, to effect economies in distribution, and to protect consumers from unlimited exploitation.

CHARLES A. LYMAN,
M. WES. TUBBS,
D. O. MAHONEY,
Legislative Committee.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY CAN NOT AFFORD TO BE UNJUST TO THE FARMERS.

This Congress and the Democratic Party can not afford to strike a blow at the great agricultural interests of this country like the passage of this law will.

The Democratic Party in the solid South may be able to roll up its customary majority regardless of its attitude toward the farmers, but the citizenship of the great northern and western agricultural States do not inherit their political faith. They are not voting a party ticket because their fathers and grandfathers did, but are holding the party in power to a strict accountability.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY HAS NOT DEALT FAIRLY WITH THE FARMERS.

I charge the Democratic Party with not dealing fairly with the farmers of the North and West.

I ask, What have you done for the farmers who, during the last crop year, produced nearly $10,000,000 worth of wealth?

You have appropriated $141,000,000 for battleships. You have appropriated $100,000,000 for the Army, although you spent almost two weeks' time making speeches on the Winston Churchill peace resolution. You have appropriated $44,000,000 for rivers and harbors.

You have done all this after talking economy and accusing the former Republican administration of being extravagant.

The 12,000,000 farmers of this country have received very little consideration at your hands.

NOTHING FOR GOOD ROADS.

The $25,000,000 appropriation for wagon roads that passed this House in February is sleeping the peaceful sleep of death in one of the committees of the Senate.

RURAL CREDITS SHELVED.

The farmers of the country demanded and were promised by this administration a law that would enable them to borrow money at a lower rate of interest and on easier terms. This would help the farmer in moving his crops and enable the tenant farmer and the young man with small capital to become the owner of a farm with a fair chance of paying for it.

Many wanted rural-credit legislation to be written into the banking and currency law, where it could have been appropriately placed, but "the powers that be" said no, and it looks as though rural-credit legislation had been relegated with the other broken promises of the Democratic Party.

UNDERWOOD TARIFF DISCRIMINATES AGAINST THE FARMERS.

By taking off the tariff on farm products you have opened wide the doors of the great home market of the United States to the farmers of the world and invited them to dump their surplus.

Argentina, since the tariff bill went into effect, has sent millions of dollars' worth of butter, beef, and corn into the United States.

Canada, which has more acres of agricultural land than the United States, is already in competition with us.

Prof. Charles McCarthy, reference librarian at Madison, Wis., an authority upon the subject, says:

A year ago when I made the statement that the farmers would be in a bad way unless they organized to meet the low tariff some laughed at the statement. Verification of what I said then now comes from other sources.

The president of the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester, England, says:

In three short months all the surplus cattle of Canada have been sold to American buyers. Imports of chilled meats in New York quickly became an established trade. Canadian cream and milk has been sold to such a large extent that there is practically no Canadian butter for export and the quantity of cheese for this market will rapidly diminish. New Zealand butter is also finding an outlet to America.

Dr. McCarthy says:

My statement is borne out by these facts. The farmers should begin to organize for better marketing and production as their only hope to meet the increased competition. We now have what are practically summer prices for butter. I believe this also demonstrates that organization is necessary or our farm industries will eventually go to the wall.

OVERPRODUCTION.

Every farmer knows that we have a surplus crop of some farm product almost every year, which brings down the price of that product below the cost of production.

Overproduction will be a frequent occurrence with no tariff on farm products.

We sometimes think that the United States is the only agricultural country.

Germany raises on an average of from six to seven times the amount of potatoes raised by the whole United States.

Last year the United States raised 331,525,000 bushels of potatoes against Germany's 1,988,591,308 bushels of potatoes. Ireland raised 139,602,358 bushels of potatoes, Canada 78,544,000 bushels, and many other countries raised a large quantity of this product.

It should be remembered that potatoes can be shipped from these countries to our sea ports on the Atlantic sea coast and to our southern ports for from 6 to 8 cents a bushel, about as much as it costs the average farmer to haul his potatoes to the nearest railroad station.

In the year 1913 Russia raised 700,000,000 bushels of wheat; France, 350,000,000 bushels; British India, 280,000,000 bushels; Germany, 138,000,000 bushels; Canada, 170,000,000 bushels; and Argentina, 135,000,000 bushels.

They are shipping eggs to this country from far-away China. In the month of December, 1913, 1,514,296 dozen of eggs, valued at $334,315, were shipped to this country. Under the 5-cent duty on eggs no importations were made.

The importation of corn has increased from 25,819 bushels to 1,632,643 bushels in November, and from 638 bushels to 2,343,444 bushels in December, and in the case of fresh meats of various kinds the importations have advanced from nothing under the old tariff to a total of 16,029,189 pounds under the new.

This shows a surrender of our market to foreign importers.

THE CONSUMER HAS RECEIVED NO BENEFIT.

If anyone will send for Government Bulletin No. 138, issued by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, they can get the retail prices of the principal articles of food in each of the 40 important cities throughout the United States.

This bulletin shows that the retail price of the 15 staple articles of food were increased over the same months the year before the tariff went into effect.

I herewith attach statement from this Government bulletin:

Comparing retail prices on October 15, 1913, with prices on the same date 1912, 13 of the 15 articles for which quotations are given advanced and 2 declined in price. Potatoes advanced 42.3 per cent, eggs advanced 14.2 per cent, round steak advanced 12.9 per cent, ham advanced 10.6 per cent, rib roast advanced 8.8 per cent, sirloin steak advanced 8.3 per cent, bacon advanced 8.2 per cent, hens advanced 7.5 per cent, pork chops advanced 6.3 per cent, butter advanced 3.7 per cent, milk advanced 2.7 per cent, corn meal advanced 1.7 per cent, and lard advanced 1 per cent. Sugar declined 8.8 per cent, and flour declined 2.6 per cent.

When the price of each of the articles of food is weighted, according to average consumption in workingmen's families, retail prices were at a higher level on October 15, 1913, than at any other time during the last 23 years and 10 months. Retail prices of food on October 15, 1913, were 70.9 per cent above the average price for the 10-year period, 1890 to 1899; 7.9 per cent above the price on October 15, 1912, and 16.9 per cent above the price on October 15, 1911.

The cities for which actual prices are shown are Atlanta, Ga.; Baltimore, Md.; Birmingham, Ala.; Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Charleston, S. C.; Chicago, Ill.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Cleveland, Ohio; Dallas, Tex.; Denver, Colo.; Detroit, Mich.; Fall River, Mass.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Kansas City, Mo.; Little Rock, Ark.; Los Angeles, Cal.; Louisville, Ky.; Manchester, N. H.; Memphis, Tenn.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Minneapolis, Minn.; Newark, N. J.; New Haven, Conn.; New Orleans, La.; New York, N. Y.; Omaha, Nebr.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Portland, Oreg.; Providence, R. I.; Richmond, Va.; St. Louis, Mo.; St. Paul, Minn.; Salt Lake City, Utah; San Francisco, Cal.; Scranton, Pa.; Seattle, Wash.; and Washington, D. C.

STAGNATION IN BUSINESS.

President Wilson, when interviewed May 28, 1914, on the business depression throughout the United States, said:

That while he was aware of the present depression of business, there was abundant evidence that it was merely psychological; that there is no material condition or substantial reason why the business of the country should not be in a most prosperous and expanding condition.

The most conservative authorities upon the unemployed say that there are from one and one-half to two million men out of employment in the United States. These conditions seem due to something more than a state of mind, as indicated by the President.

When our laboring people are out of employment they cease to become consumers, and this injures the markets of the farmer.

Every man, woman, and child in the United States consumes 4.7 bushels of wheat a year, which is equivalent to a barrel of flour a year, while in Russia the consumption of wheat is 2.6 bushels, and in India seven-tenths of a bushel of wheat is consumed by the average inhabitant.

The American people are better clothed and better fed than any class of people in the world, and therefore the 100,000,000 inhabitants of America afford the best home market for the farmers of any country in the world.

FOREIGN CONVICT LABOR COMPETITION.

A recent investigation establishes the fact that there are 2,441,000 convicts in foreign prisons competing with our American workmen. This convict labor is being sold by the countries where the prisons are located at from 5 cents to 25 cents per day. The foreign manufacturer who buys this labor has no rent, storage, light, heat, or power to pay for in the majority of cases. These convicts are manufacturing practically every kind of article that is being manufactured abroad, and these convict-made goods are coming to the United States under the Underwood tariff law in unrestricted competition with goods manufactured by our American labor.

It is conservatively estimated that the annual output of foreign convict labor amounts to $560,000,000 per year.

No wonder our imports are steadily increasing and our exports are falling off.

EXPORTS FALLING OFF.

Official figures from the Department of Commerce show that under the heading of "Manufactures for the further use in manufacturing" our exports have fallen off $5,100,000 in the single month of April, 1914, compared with the corresponding month of the previous year.

I voted against the passage of the Underwood tariff bill, and in doing so I said, in a speech I made against it, that the passage of that bill would be a reversal of a great industrial policy of the United States, an industrial policy which has brought us great prosperity.

If this prosperity continues under the new industrial policy of "tariff for revenue only," it will be the first time in our country's history.

The Underwood tariff bill has been in force less than nine months, but in that brief space of time it has proven such a failure that there is an overwhelming sentiment against it.

I can not vote for the so-called "Clayton antitrust bill" in its present form, with a discrimination against farmer organizations. I am disappointed in the bill in this and other particulars, and hope it may be amended by the adoption of the Nelson and other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, if I am in order I desire to offer an amendment to the second paragraph——

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed.

Mr. HULINGS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HULINGS. What is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is considering the first paragraph and debate has been fixed at 70 minutes. The gentleman can offer his amendment later.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know as I desire to use five minutes on this question, but I do want to say that, in my opinion, the framers of the Sherman antitrust law never dreamed that at any time it would be used as an instrument to oppress either organized labor or farmers' associations. It would seem, at first thought, when you come down to the legal or ethical point, that farmers' organizations, if incorporated, should be controlled as any other corporation; but when we take into consideration the slight chance of controlling commodities of universal production it would seem to be impossible for the farmers as a class to organize and get their product in such shape they could so control it as to become a monopoly. They can cooperate to such an extent they can keep from becoming the prey of commission and unprincipled middle men. That has been the main object of farmers' societies and farmers' cooperative associations. It has been to try to get at least a fair share of the profit of their toil and a fair share of the money that the consumer pays. I have seen before the days of farmers' cooperative associations when they have had a hard time to make a living, and after they had established the cooperation that they had bettered their condition.

It seems to me that no one should desire to see them put at the mercy of either the commission men or the middle men who prey on them, and that is the reason I think that the farmer, who is the largest in number of any one class in our country, should have the benefit of some fair laws and some fair consideration. I do not think that the farmers as a class want any special legislation or any marked favor. Neither do they desire to be put in a class where, without any chance to form a monopoly, they can be accused of attempting to monopolize trade and be harassed, as they can be, if we leave this bill in its present form. That should not be done. They should not be harassed and forced out of business or forced back into the old ruts that they had to follow before they commenced to cooperate, and I think if you put this measure on the statute books in its present form that so far as the American farmer, the principal class in numbers in this country is concerned, you are taking a step backward and injuring him instead of benefiting him. [Applause.] I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in this behalf that I have consulted three Members of the Committee on the Judiciary and was informed that no representative of the farmers came before that committee and demanded this legislation or any part of it. The facts are that the farmers' part in this bill is simply to be used as a stalking horse to obtain other features of this legislation. Well was it said—I noticed the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] in his maiden speech said it—that that side of the House was redeeming its pledges, in that ancient and stately joke perpetrated and promulgated at Baltimore, to the farmers and laborers. I desire to speak about it, especially relating to the trust feature, and in support of the Nelson amendment, which seeks to give at least a measure of the favor professed in this bill but in fact withheld.

So far as the farmers are concerned, this is the second installment of the so-called favorable trust legislation. The first installment was presented in the Underwood tariff bill, the sponsors of which claimed it to be a fulfillment of the tariff plank of the Baltimore convention. That plank stated the general Democratic policy for tariff revision downward as follows:

> We favor the immediate downward revision of the existing high and, in many cases, prohibitive tariff duties, insisting that material reductions be speedily made upon the necessaries of life.

You will note that it stood for a reduction of duties rather than a removal of duties. The bill was said to be one for revenue only. In a subsequent clause it provided that certain articles should have the tariff removed absolutely and placed upon the free list, the following being the language used:

> Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products and articles which are sold abroad more cheaply than at home should be put upon the free list.

This is the only authority for expansion of the free list found in the Baltimore platform. In the Underwood bill there was a large expansion of the free list. Eighty per cent of the value of all the American products placed upon the free list and which were not on the free list under the Payne law were products of the farm, so that the majority of this House considered farm products as being in competition with trust-controlled products or were sold abroad more cheaply than at home.

Every farmer in the United States knows that neither one of those statements are true, so that in the name of antitrust legislation a most gigantic imposition was perpetrated upon the farmers of this country.

Two statements are surprising to the country. First, that the farmers' products are trust produced or in competition with trust-produced articles; second, that farmers' products are sold abroad cheaper than at home, and yet these two statements are the only basis for the free listing of nearly all the products of the Northwest.

And now they come in with their second installment of trust legislation for the farmers, and while the first installment was an imposition this one is a fraud. They first include the farmer organization with the laboring men in section 7. Here they pretend to preserve for the farmers, laboring men, and horticultural associations special privileges. But they are preserved only while in a state of repose so far as the farmers are concerned. When they come into action for the purpose of carrying out only those things that can be of value to them, they are prohibited, except where a further provision is provided in the act itself. Now, then, in section 7 the farmers and the labor organizations were placed upon a parity; but in section 18 we find the labor organizations are specially provided for. So that each and every act by which they can accomplish the legitimate purposes of their organization is permitted by the law. We find no corresponding section to section 18 to protect the farmers. Section 18 is as follows:

> SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.
> And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business or happens to be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to, or withholding from, any persons engaged in such dispute, any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner, and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto. Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be construed or held unlawful.

This matter, Mr. Chairman, as I say, was not asked for by the farmers of the United States. The farmers of the United States are in favor of equality before the law with the manufacturers, miners, laborers, and all others of this country. But when there is presented, as this bill presents, a motley mass of discriminations and favors to various industries denied to others, then in the general skirmish and scrimmage the farmers are entitled to have their share of that discrimination. For that reason the farmers of the United States do not want this meaningless sop thrown to them in this bill, which has no more substance or satisfaction in it than a Dead Sea apple, which would crumble to ashes upon touch; because there is no provision throughout the whole bill in any place that would protect them in carrying out any special course of action whereby they might forward their industry for the purpose of increasing the prices of their products or perhaps reducing the prices of those which they bought.

Perhaps the most exasperating feature of this legislation is the cheap estimate placed upon the farmers' intelligence and vigilance. The farmers of this country will see through this cheap attempt to placate them for the wrongs which have been inflicted upon them by this Congress and will resent the attempt to make them a stalking horse for other classes interested in legislation. This bill discriminates against the small dealer certainly; whether there is a discrimination against the large dealer is a problem. It has nets to catch small fishes, but none apparently strong enough to catch large ones. The discriminations in section 3 must operate in favor of the large mine owner and against the small.

Section 7 to the farmer must appear a fraud upon its face.

Section 8 grants to the railroads of the United States means of combination and agreement hitherto denied by Congress and until this committee acted which neither House of Congress ever dared to favor.

The Nelson amendment we are now discussing is a discrimination. But if you are in the discriminating business, it is important that you give 30,000,000 people of the United States interested in agriculture their share of the discrimination. But this you deny.

I can understand why this bill was drafted by three Members of the majority party in conjunction with the White House with the minority excluded, as was stated in the opening of this debate. It was so with the tariff bill, which discriminates against the farmer. It was drafted by the majority Members with the same aid, because it is a better means of keeping the real purpose of legislators in the dark. A great many people in the United States thought when the tariff bill was being drafted that trust articles and trust-controlled products, and those that were in competition with trust-controlled products, should be placed upon the free list; that that was intended for the manufacturing interests of the United States, and especially those of the East. But when it was unveiled it was found to strike to the extent of 80 per cent the products of the soil, and to the extent of only 20 per cent other products. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WILSON of Florida). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, will that side consume some of its time?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CARR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CARR] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, history and chronicle are full of the achievements of heroes, kings, and statesmen in war and politics, but slight insight is given us into the commercial customs or methods of business of ancient or even medieval times. And yet we know that mighty wars were fought whose obscure objects were really the extension of trade, the acquisition of land, the increase of wealth. Since the day when Joseph forced the people to pay him for his corn, first their money, then their flocks, their cattle, and their asses, and lastly their land and their freedom, the spirit of monopoly has pervaded trade. From the primitive practices of royal monopolists of brick and papyrus in Egypt, of mines and banking in Greece, of salt in Rome, and of many less extensive but more significant methods of trade control among merchants, factors, and shipowners, this genius of monopoly has grown through the years in strength and influence until recently one of the leading bankers of America, Mr. George F. Baker, was constrained to admit before the Pujo committee that the conditions prevailing in the United States had brought about a situation not entirely comfortable for a great country to be in. This grave situation is not a result of the natural growth of industry. On the contrary, it has been brought about through unfair trade practices, through the artificial elimination of competition, through the control of credit achieved by a small group of men over our banks and industries. This result has been attained by three principal methods: First, through the consolidation of banks and trust companies, the reservoirs of money, and their control and the control of the large funds of life insurance companies, through stock holdings, voting trusts, and interlocking directorates; second, through large combinations and consolidations of public-service corporations and the formation of huge industrial trusts, intertwined in interest through common directors, voting trusts, and stock holdings; and, third, through banker management. The very immensity of these trusts and combinations made necessary their financing through bankers who had acquired the power to control the resources of the depositories of the people's money, and thereby enabled a few large banking houses to demand representation upon the directorates and to dictate the business policy of these large commercial units, the issue of stocks and bonds beyond the reasonable needs of business, the purchase of supplies from favored concerns at prices wholly arbitrary, and for the benefit of corporations in which the same group of men were largely interested.

In other words, through the power acquired by the bankers to grant or withhold credit they were not only able to decree the combination and consolidation of industrial units, thereby making necessary large issues of securities and stocks, determined in amount almost absolutely by the will of the bankers, but they were enabled to charge for their services as underwriters all that the traffic would bear. These huge commissions were only made possible through large consolidations, and therefore it became the interests of the bankers to control industrial organizations and to effect these combinations. With the consequent elimination of competition and the ability to fix prices and control markets they were enabled to earn their interest charges and to pay dividends upon fictitious valuations.

An interesting example of the "vicious circle of control through which our financial oligarchy now operates" is stated by Mr. Louis D. Brandeis in his book, Other People's Money, and How the Bankers Use It:

J. P. Morgan (or a partner), a director of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, causes that company to sell to J. P. Morgan & Co. an issue of bonds. J. P. Morgan & Co. borrow the money with which to pay for the bonds from the Guaranty Trust Co., of which Mr. Morgan (or a partner) is a director. J. P. Morgan & Co. sell the bonds to the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Co., of which Mr. Morgan (or a partner) is a director. The New Haven spends the proceeds of the bonds in purchasing steel rails from the United States Steel Corporation, of which Mr. Morgan (or a partner) is a director. The United States Steel Corporation spends the proceeds of the rails in purchasing electrical supplies from the General Electric Co., of which Mr. Morgan (or a partner) is a director. The General Electric sells supplies to the Western Union Telegraph Co., a subsidiary of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and in both Mr. Morgan (or a partner) is a director. The telegraph company has an exclusive wire contract with the Reading, of which Mr. Morgan (or a partner) is a director. The Reading buys its passenger cars from the Pullman Co., of which Mr. Morgan (or a partner) is a director. The Pullman Co. buys (for local use) locomotives from the Baldwin Locomotive Co., of which Mr. Morgan (or a partner) is a director. The Reading, the General Electric, the Steel Corporation, and the New Haven, like the Pullman, buy locomotives from the Baldwin Co. The Steel Corporation, the Telephone Co., the New Haven, the Reading, the Pullman, and the Baldwin Cos., like the Western Union, buy electrical supplies from the General Electric. The Baldwin, the Pullman, the Reading, the Telephone, the Telegraph, and the General Electric Cos., like the New Haven, buy steel products from the Steel Corporation. Each and every one of the companies last named markets its securities through J. P. Morgan & Co., each deposits its funds with J. P. Morgan & Co., and with these funds of each the firm enters upon further operations.

This specific illustration is in part supposititious, but it represents truthfully the operation of interlocking directorates. Only it must be multiplied many times, and with many permutations, to represent fully the extent to which the interests of a few men are intertwined. Instead of taking the New Haven as the railroad starting point in our example, the New York Central, the Santa Fe, the Southern, the Lehigh Valley, the Chicago & Great Western, the Erie, or the Pere Marquette might have been selected; instead of the Guaranty Trust Co. as the banking reservoir, any one of a dozen other important banks or trust companies; instead of the Penn Mutual as purchaser of the bonds, other insurance companies; instead of the General Electric, its qualified competitor, the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co. The chain is, indeed, endless, for each controlled corporation is entwined with many others.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party is pledged not to the regulation of monopoly but to its absolute destruction by the enactment of specific legislation. The Baltimore platform declares:

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We, therefore, favor the rigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States. We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including, among others, the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directorates, of stock watering, of discrimination in price, and the control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions.

The series of trust bills presented to this Congress are designed to fulfill that pledge to the American people. The present bill embraces six important provisions exclusive of procedural rules, as follows:

First. It attempts to prevent unfair discrimination in price whereby great corporations, by selling their goods at a less price in the particular communities where their rivals are engaged in business than in other places throughout the country, endeavor to destroy competition and render unprofitable the business of competitors. The prohibition is comprehensive and permits of exception only on account of differences in grade, quality, and quantity of the commodity sold, and on account of differences in the cost of transportation. Although 19 or 20 States have, within the last few years, enacted such laws to correct such discriminatory practices within their borders it is very necessary that there should be national legislation on the subject, as it is now possible for a great corporation to lower the prices of its commodities throughout the borders of one State without violation of State laws, and thereby destroy the business of competitors within that State.

Second. It is made unlawful for the owner or operator of a mine or the selling agent thereof in commerce to refuse to sell such product to a responsible person who applies to purchase the same. Thereby it is made impossible that the bounty of the earth shall be monopolized.

Third. It is made unlawful for a manufacturer to contract with a dealer not to use or deal in the commodities of a competing manufacturer. Such practice results in driving out competitive articles from a community and tends to establish a monopoly in the trade of the commodity handled under the exclusive contract and generally results in sales at a higher profit. Very often, however, the merchant finds his shelves filled with articles he is unable to sell. It is unfair to the dealer, but it is more grievously unfair to the millions of American consumers who are compelled to purchase the necessaries of life through the ordinary channels of trade in their respective communities.

Fourth. It is made unlawful for a corporation engaged in commerce to acquire the whole or any part of the stock of another corporation engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition or create a monopoly of any line of trade in any section or community. The evil to be avoided by this prohibition is obvious. It goes much further than the Sherman antitrust law and defines with practical precision in what an undue restraint of trade consists.

Fifth. It is made unlawful after two years (a) for an individual, a member of a partnership, or a director or other officer of a corporation engaged in the business of producing or selling equipment, materials, or supplies to railroads or common carriers to act as a director, officer, or employee of another corporation or common carrier purchasing from such person or the partnership of which he is a member or the corporation of which he is a director or other officer; (b) for any banker, director, or other officer of a bank to be a director, officer, or employee of any common carrier for which such person or bank or trust company acts as underwriter or from which such person, banker, or trust company purchases securities; (c) for any person to be at the same time a director, officer, or employee of more than one bank, banking association, or trust company whose deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregate more than $2,500,000; (d) for any person to be at the same time a director in any two or more commercial corporations either of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, except common carriers subject to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Sixth. It is provided that nothing contained in the antitrust law shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural, or horticultural organizations or to restrain individual members of such organizations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof.

The provisions of sections 9 against interlocking directorates is one of the most important and far-reaching legal restraints in the whole history of corporate reform. It is one which, as the President has said, opinion deliberately sanctions and for which business waits. In his message of January 20, 1914, the President said:

> It [business] awaits with acquiescence, in the first place, for laws which will effectually prohibit and prevent such interlockings of the personnel of the directorates of great corporations, banks, and railroads, industrial, commercial, and public-service bodies, as in effect result in making those who borrow and those who lend practically one and the same, those who sell and those who buy but the same persons trading with one another under different names and in different combinations, and those who affect to compete; in fact, partners and masters of some whole field of business.

It was developed by the Pujo committee that Mr. George F. Baker, chairman of the board of directors of the First National Bank of New York, is a director in 22 corporations having aggregate resources of $2,272,000,000, and that the directors of that bank are directors in not less than 27 other corporations whose aggregate resources are $4,270,000,000. Mr. James Stillman, chairman of the board of directors of the National City Bank, is a director in 7 corporations, with aggregate resources of $2,476,000,000, and that the directors of that bank are directors in no less than 41 other corporations which have aggregate resources of $10,564,000,000; that the members of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. are directors in 47 of the largest corporations in the country; and that these three groups, Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co., the directors of the First National Bank, and the National City Bank, hold 118 directorships in 34 banks and trust companies having total resources of $2,679,000,000 and total deposits of $1,983,000,000; 30 directorships in 10 insurance companies having total assets of $2,293,000,000; 105 directorships in 32 transportation systems having a total capitalization of $11,784,000,000 and a total mileage of 150,200 miles; 63 directorships in 24 producing and trading corporations having a total capitalization of $3,339,000,000; 25 directorships in 12 public-utility corporations having a total capitalization of $2,150,000,000; in all, 341 directorships in 112 corporations having aggregate resources or capitalization of $22,245,000,000.

Such a condition is contrary to public policy, is violative of the spirit of business fairness, and is destructive of that freedom and democracy of individual opportunity which ought to characterize the institutions of a republic. It is offensive to that scriptural injunction that—

> No man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other.

It is in moral opposition to that relationship of trust which legally exists between a corporation and a director. It is a clear rule of law that directors of a corporation are trustees for the stockholders and that the corporate property is a trust fund to be administered by them in the utmost good faith. No contract in which a director is interested can be sustained against attack where the interested director is a necessary part of the quorum. In England they have a rule that whenever it appears that a director of a corporation is interested in corporate matters under consideration by the board of directors, such director is thereby removed from office. In an Ohio case it was said:

> A director whose personal interests are adverse to those of the corporation has no right to be or act as a director. As soon as he finds that he has personal interests which will conflict with those of the company he ought to resign

Each corporation is interested in obtaining an advantageous bargain and each ought to have a sole claim upon the best endeavors of its agents. As the New York court said:

> The law permits no one to act in such inconsistent relations. It does not stop to inquire whether the contract or transaction was fair or unfair. It stops the inquiry when the relation is disclosed, and sets aside the transaction or refuses to enforce it, at the instance of the party whom the fiduciary undertook to represent, without undertaking to deal with the question of abstract justice in the particular case.

As long ago as 1880 Mr. Justice Field said:

> It is among the rudiments of the law that the same person can not act for himself and at the same time, with respect to the same matter, as the agent of another whose interests are conflicting. The two positions impose different obligations, and their union would at once raise a conflict between interest and duty; and, constituted as humanity is, in the majority of cases duty would be overborne in the struggle.

And yet this salutary rule has been made wholly ineffective to prevent unfair contracts between corporations through the agency of a common director by judicial decision that such contracts are valid when the vote of the interested director was not necessary to carry the resolution or his presence to constitute a quorum, and that even where his vote and presence were so necessary, the contract is voidable only in a proper proceeding taken for that purpose by the corporation, its shareholders, or its creditors, and is not absolutely null and void.

And yet everyone knows that it is the common practice in such cases for a director actively to interest himself in the discussions of such contracts and then have himself recorded as "not voting." Where the interested director is a representative of the fiscal agent of such corporation, it is unnecessary for him even to be present at meetings where such contracts are voted, for since he controls the supply of capital his will can not be disregarded.

This ruling of the courts has rendered actions to set aside such contracts so infrequent as to be almost negligible. Manifestly stockholders have but slight knowledge of the transactions of large corporations which are managed exclusively by a board of directors. Nor would knowledge alone suffice since they are under the necessity of producing evidence often carefully concealed and difficult of exposure. Even with the necessary evidence at hand, a suit against a large corporation or one of its directors is usually an expensive and protracted proceeding, and one which stockholders of moderate means will not often undertake. Even large stockholders may very well fear the power of the interlocked interests of such a director and his associates and conclude rather to bear the ills he has than fly to others that he knows not of.

Mr. Chairman, I would go still further than this bill, for whereas it has been provided that no person shall be a director in two or more commercial corporations either of which has capital of more than $1,000,000, I would extend the prohibition to prevent any person who is a stockholder to the extent of 10 per cent or more of the share capital of any corporation capitalized at $1,000,000 or more from being at the same time a director in any corporation capitalized at more than $1,000,000, except the corporations in which he is a stockholder. I can see no difference in principle in the one case than in the other. The evils to be avoided are identical, the conflict of interest is the same, the divided allegiance is equally evident.

The time has come, Mr. Chairman, to deal effectively with these abuses. The paternal control of a few self-constituted masters can not longer be suffered to obstruct the industrial activity which is the spirit of liberty and the very lure of life. In this bill we lay the ax to the root of the tree of monopolistic control. We seek to destroy the processes which make monopoly possible. And further fulfilling our pledges we make guilt personal. We declare then the offending individual shall himself answer for his offending. We seek to protect the commerce of the Nation and to allow it to flow in the natural channels of free and fair competition, to permit the individualistic spirit of America to find expression and our human resources to be utilized in the freedom of our industrial life. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back eight minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I should not undertake to discuss this provision further were it not for the deep respect I feel for the high-minded patriotism of the author of the amendment, Mr. NELSON, a compliment I wish to pay him in this public way. I think, however, he, with some others, is proceeding on an assumption with reference to these amendments which is not sustained by the actual conditions of the discussion. That assumption is that in some sort of a way Congress is giving to the farming organizations and to other mutual organizations the rights which they are to enjoy in the future. That is an error. Their right to exist and their conditions of existence will continue to spring from the legislation of the respective States; and the farming organizations in which my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON] is justly so much concerned can look with confidence to the legislature of his own State for their charters of privileges and their bills of rights.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Let me first complete this thought. It is only under conditions whereby any commercial organization may become a trust or monopoly that the jurisdiction of national legislation will attach to that organization at all. It is very misapprehensive of the situation to suggest any fear for the farming organizations which exist in this country, because in evidence of that we have the actual situation itself to dispel such fear. There is the well-known California Citrus Fruit Association, of the Pacific coast, which has reached very, very large proportions, and the operations of which are a matter of national notice. Yet, large and important as it is, there has been no effort to apply even the unamended Sherman antitrust law to its operations. There is, therefore, no ground to express the fear that the National Government is about to or may at any time proceed against the farming organizations of the country. Their rights will continue to be the rights which are granted them by the respective States. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin for his question.

Mr. NELSON. If the States can properly grant them the rights the gentleman mentions, why can not the Congress grant them also the right to be protected interstate?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The Congress does grant that right under the present antitrust laws, especially as qualified and amended by this clause, section 7.

Mr. NELSON. One further question. The gentleman is a very able representative of labor, and as such he asked relief for labor organizations because they were always under the threat of being prosecuted under the Sherman law. Why does he not ask, in all fairness, that farmers be treated as he has insisted that labor should be treated?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. We do give them the same rights in the same clause and in the same language of section 7.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, but the gentleman——

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. There was this difference: The labor organizations had been attacked, and successfully attacked, in the courts.

Mr. NELSON. But the farmers have also been attacked in Kentucky, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Both of them are relieved from that attack in the same provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland three minutes more.

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman from Maryland is very fair, and I want to say to him that I am very sorry to see that labor has deserted its old-time ally, the farmer. Labor is specifically excluded, because of the two qualifications, "capital stock" and "conducted for profit." But what has the farmer, if he organizes a cooperative business association for profit?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. That introduces what I would wish to add to my remarks. What is it that the farmer of the United States wants? I do not believe he wants to raise prices, as a trust or a monopoly is instinctively designed to do. What he wants is to get for his own products the prices that he knows the consumers of this country are paying for them. If we could give the farmer a method by which he could secure for his product what the consumers actually pay, I am sure he would be delighted; farming prosperity would be greatly augmented and the Nation itself blessed by such prosperity.

Now, there is nothing in this provision that is not designed to give him the fullest opportunities to organize with reference to the marketing of that product through mutual cooperation. But I am sure the gentleman recognizes that in dealing with the trusts the statutes must draw lines of distinction, and the statute in this particular case draws its line of distinction between the organization of men and the monopolizers of commodities. That distinction is sustained by the instincts of justice in the human race. The ordinary workman in the factory can combine his manhood, his intelligence, and his organizing instincts for mutual advantage. The farmer is explicitly mentioned as having the right to do the same thing. Now, to do otherwise would be to open the gates for, possibly, that citrus fruit association, if it ever should overgrow and overleap the bounds where national welfare becomes involved. I think that in all fairness to the gentleman from Wisconsin it can be claimed for this section 7, as it is now amended, that it is equally just to all forms of human labor, on the farm as well as in the factory. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, we do not care to discuss this any further on this side. I suppose gentlemen on the other side have completed what they wished to say.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, I speak in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON]. I believe there was something also in the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] a few minutes ago when he said that this bill seems to treat of several distinct lines of legislation. It is characteristic of this Congress to do an omnibus legislative business. I believe it would have been wiser for the Congress to have treated the question of labor and farm cooperative associations entirely separately from monopolies and trusts.

This bill—and I do not rely on my own judgment alone, but from general discussion of eminent gentlemen—is very much complicated; but there should be no misunderstanding regarding the rights of farm cooperative associations in an endeavor to obtain just consideration when organizing among themselves for the purpose of profitably marketing their own produce.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I should not impose further remarks on the House if I did not really believe that there is great merit in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota. The first paragraph of section 7 of the bill as reported by the committee and as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina is as follows:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations, orders, or associations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof, nor shall such organizations or orders or associations, nor the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Now, I have prepared what I think would be a proper substitute for the first paragraph of section 7, as quoted above. It is as follows:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to prevent the existence or operation of labor organizations; or to forbid such labor organizations or persons belonging thereto from entering into any contract, agreement, or arrangement with a view to lessening the hours of labor; or of increasing their wages; or of bettering their conditions; or to forbid the existence and operation of consumers' organizations; or to forbid such organizations or members thereof from entering into any contract, agreement, or arrangement with a view to lessening the cost to them of goods, wares, and merchandise, or of any agricultural or horticultural product; or to forbid the existence or operation of any farmers' organization or any agricultural or horticultural organization; or to forbid such organizations or the members thereof from entering into any contract, agreement, or arrangement with a view to reducing the cost to them of tools, implements, machinery, fertilizers, or of any other supplies needed by persons engaged in agriculture or horticulture; or with a view to collective bargaining in the sale of their products or to obtain better credit or lower interest; nor shall such organizations or orders or associations, nor the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

My objection to section 7 as it has been amended is that under it only farmers' organizations without capital stock and not conducted for profit would be legal under this section. In other words, it exempts from antitrust laws only farmers' organizations organized for mutual help along social, literary, and educational lines. There has been no attempt to dissolve such farmers' organizations, so that the provisions of section 7 really give to farmers nothing. While we are considering this question we should in plain language give the farmers the right to organize, even with capital stock or for profit, so long as their organizations are along legitimate lines to aid them in marketing their products as cheaply as possible and in purchasing their supplies as cheaply as possible.

Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman of Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is broad enough to give the farmers what they need and should have. I think it was Sir Horace Plunkett, who made a thorough study of American agriculture, and who has devoted his life largely in an effort to improve agricultural conditions in Ireland, who said that improvement in agriculture must come through better farming, better business, and better living, and that the first of these was better business in farming. Improvement in farming—the making of the farm what it should be in this country—must come through better transportation facilities, better educational advantages, and better organization among our farmers.

As a member of the Judiciary Committee I filed a minority report to this bill, in which I said:

The law not only should not prohibit but should encourage farmers to organize with a view to purchasing implements, machinery, and other farm supplies at less cost and with the view to collective bargaining in the sale of their products and in the purchase of supplies. In France, Germany, and other European countries farmers' organizations are authorized by law. The line along which these organizations can act is definitely defined. Governmental aid, direction, and assistance is given. Such organizations are encouraged to engage in a wide field of purely business transactions. These organizations have contributed immensely to the expansion of the agricultural interests of these countries. It would be exceedingly unfortunate at this time, when we are about to enter upon the important task of providing our farmers with better credit facilities, to enact a law which may be construed to make all farmers' organizations unlawful except such as are organized for the mutual benefit of members along literary, insurance, and social lines.

Practically every other business is highly organized but the business of farming. There are about 6,500,000 farmers. Something like 12,000,000 persons over 10 years of age toil on the farm. The farmers are at a great disadvantage. Labor is organized. Business is organized. Concentration, combination, cooperation everywhere except among the farmers. With the most intelligent farmers of the world, in business cooperation our farmers are far behind the less intelligent farmers of other countries. To aid our farmers in the line of greater cooperation has now become a national duty, and it would be hardly short of a public calamity to enact a statute which on its face restricts and limits to a narrow sphere the purposes for which agricultural associations may be formed.

I know the gentlemen constituting the leadership on this committee have no desire to neglect the farmer. I know the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS], who is the champion in the interest of labor, has no desire to do an injustice to the farmer, and yet, as I have studied this question, I believe that the National Government ought not only to permit farmers to organize, but that the National Government should make appropriation to encourage the farmers to organize.

The United States is doing more and has done more along the line of education for the farming interests than any nation on earth, but along the lines of teaching our farmers to organize for better business we are a quarter of a century behind the great European Governments. There is no question about that.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. Wherein do the farmers get more in the Nelson amendment than we have given them in the amendment just adopted?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I think there is some question of whether there can be a farmers' organization to aid the farmers in marketing the crops more cheaply, or in purchasing their supplies at a less price under the committee amendment which has been adopted. To carry on this kind of an organization it may be necessary to have capital stock, and it may be necessary that these organizations shall be for the purpose of profit. As long as we do not permit the farmer to organize trusts to elevate prices of cotton, wheat, or some other staple product, we are doing the country no injury.

We passed the tariff act, but we all know that under that act the farmer is largely placed in competition with the farmers of the world, however ignorant they may be, or however cheap the labor they may employ, or however cheaply they may be able to produce farm products. We passed the currency act, but you postponed the bill to give our farmers cheaper interest. What have you done for the farmer? Now, when you are passing a third great bill, you are about to place therein a section which, in my judgment, does not do the farmers of this country justice. I believe that it is in the interest not only of the farmer but in the interest of the great consuming masses of the country that we should encourage the farmers to organize to market their crops and in buying supplies.

Gentlemen who pose here as champions for labor are indirectly pleading against labor when they oppose the organization of farmers. We want the farmers to organize so that the products of the farm can come more directly to consumers with less cost and with a fewer number of middlemen. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas, a member of the committee.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota. In the exception made in section 7 as it is written we use the same language in reference to farmers' organizations that we do in reference to labor and other organizations mentioned. We believe to that extent they should be differentiated from industrial and other corporations organized for profit. Gentlemen, I represent a farming district, and I also represent one of the greatest horticultural districts in the United States, but I am opposed to incorporating a provision in this bill that will allow the farmers and the horticulturists of this country to enter into combinations to increase the price of their products, which are industrial commodities, when in the existing law we forbid manufacturers and other classes of citizens from entering into such combinations.

I come from the South, and the South produces three-fourths of the cotton in the world, and perhaps more. I am opposed to any law that would allow the cotton farmers of the South to enter into combinations to control the price of cotton which at the same time would make it a crime for the manufacturers who purchase that cotton and manufacture it into cloth to enter into like combinations to raise the price of the manufactured product. For these reasons we think the amendment should be rejected. I represent the majority of the committee in opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I hope the House will vote it down. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, just one word before we vote. The Illinois antitrust act, as my friend from Illinois knows, undertook to exempt agricultural products and live stock while in the hands of the producer and raiser. It was in these words:

> The provisions of this act shall not apply to agricultural products and live stock while in the hands of the producer and raiser.

That was in the antitrust act.

A man by the name of Connolly was the defendant when this particular act came to the notice of the Supreme Court. When the Supreme Court came to pass upon it they said that that act was void because it undertook to exempt agricultural products and live stock.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. That was under a constitutional limitation on the power of the Legislature of Illinois, and that is not in the United States Constitution.

Mr. WEBB. I understand that perfectly. The fourteenth amendment forbids any State to deny every citizen the equal protection of the law. That is the ground on which the Supreme Court in this case puts its opinion in declaring the statute unconstitutional. But I want to call attention to this one sentence in the opinion of that great and good judge, Judge Harlan:

> We conclude this part of the discussion by saying that to declare that some of the class engaged in domestic trade or commerce shall be deemed criminals if they violate the regulations prescribed by the State for the purpose of protecting the public against illegal combinations formed to destroy competition and to control prices, and that others of the same class shall not be bound to regard those regulations, but may combine their capital, skill, or acts to destroy competition and to control prices for their special benefit, is so manifestly a denial of the equal protection of the laws that further or extended argument to establish that position would seem to be unnecessary.

The proposition of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is to allow a certain class of people to form corporations with the avowed purpose of monopolizing certain products for the purpose of enhancing the prices of those products. If that be his amendment, I do not believe that any man ought to vote for it, because I do not see why one man should have the right to enhance the price of a certain class of products by monopoly whereas another man is denied that same right and is put in jail if he does it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Therefore the gentleman feels that farm organizations should be properly under the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. WEBB. No; I do not believe that they should, if they are organizations for mutual help, without profit, just like labor organizations, and this bill expressly legalizes their existence.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman explain how any farm organization not organized for profit could possibly be in violation of the terms of the law?

Mr. WEBB. If a farmer or a doctor or a merchant or a manufacturer, or a combination of them, violates the law of the land, they ought to be punished for it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under the Webb amendment which we have just agreed to, would it not be lawful for 10,000 or 100,000 farmers to join an organization not for profit?

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely.

Mr. MANN. To raise the price of wheat or the price of cotton or to refuse to sell it at a less price than a certain fixed price higher than the then market price?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know whether it would go that far or not. As long as the product is their own cotton or corn they can hold it as long as they please.

Mr. MANN. I asked the question, and the gentleman said a while ago that he did not believe in that; but is not that the effect of the amendment that we agreed to, as long as the organization is not for profit, that it shall not be considered as an organization in restraint of trade?

Mr. WEBB. That is what the amendment says; yes.

Mr. MANN. So that if a million farmers, if they could get them to agree, could agree not to sell cotton below a fixed price or corn or wheat or any other product below a fixed price, and that agreement would be lawful?

Mr. WEBB. So long as the farm products are in the hands of those who produce them.

Mr. MANN. It might not be in hand, but it might be in a warehouse.

Mr. WEBB. That is still in the producer's possession.

Mr. CARR. Would it not be for profit if it raised the price, and therefore illegal?

Mr. MANN. But it would not be an organization for profit.

Mr. CARR. That is what the gentleman says—organized for profit.

Mr. WEBB. I do not believe we ought to permit corporations organized for profit to monopolize any product and to depress or raise the price of any product, for such would be offensive to every principle of law against monopoly and restraint of trade.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NELSON) there were—ayes 23, noes 59.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, after the word "laws," at the end of the Webb amendment, add the following:

"There shall be no abridgment of the right of wage earners and producers to organize for the protection of wages and improvement of labor conditions."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I claim no pride of authorship in this amendment. A very much greater Bryan than I is the man who wrote this amendment. I have copied it verbatim from the Democratic platform enunciated at Baltimore by the Democratic Party, and it is declared to be the last word of that party on this particular subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that according to his understanding the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] controls the time for debate.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a part of the Democratic platform, and it gives me a great deal of pleasure to dish up to the Democrats here an amendment which ordinarily I know they would not adopt, but which, under the peculiar conditions existing, it being a part of their own platform, they will surely adopt.

It goes a good deal further than the amendment that has been adopted, for it provides that there shall be no abridgment of the right of labor to organize to promote higher wages and protect their own product, and it is true it might, under interpretation, grant labor a great deal more rights than labor has demanded. But it is a part of the Democratic platform.

Mr. HENRY and Mr. SLOAN rose

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield first to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY. Does the gentleman wish to adopt all of the Democratic platform?

Mr. BRYAN. I will say to the gentleman that I could hardly ask to put all of the Democratic platform in this bill, for if we were to do so we would save the Panama Canal.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman knows that all of his amendment is in section 7 as amended?

Mr. BRYAN. If it is already in the bill, then it will not be out of place to call the matter to the attention of Congress and permit Congress to vote upon it. The Democratic platform has some good things in it, but I have noticed that it has not always been approved. I have noticed that on two or three occasions it has been denied recognition on the floor of this House, and I am anxious to see whether in this particular case the very words of the Democratic platform will prove to be obnoxious to the members of the Democratic Party on this floor. I ask that the amendment be adopted; it comes from such an eminent authority.

I now yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Speaking about the plank in the Baltimore platform, I want to ask the gentleman if he has read the latest bulletin to discover whether or not it is a slight interference and like a good many others it has been repudiated?

Mr. BRYAN. Well, I have not discussed the latest bulletin, but I recognize the fact that when we are on the Democratic platform, according to some precedents, we have to learn what the latest authority is about it, but I do not think in a case of this kind, in a matter involving the Democratic Party's interpretation of its duty to labor, that anybody would have to be consulted, and I think the fact that this amendment is a plank from the Democratic platform ought to be enough not to require any debate whatever, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. CARLIN. I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have incorporated in the RECORD in my time a letter from the four religious organizations of Tuolumne County, Cal., against polygamy and in favor of a constitutional amendment prohibiting it.

Mr. BRYAN. I would like to ask the gentleman what the subject of polygamy has got to do with the Democratic Party going off after strange gods? I want the Democratic Party to stick loyally to its one platform till death, and I do not know how polygamy has anything to do with that.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; to anybody interested on this subject, of course. I always yield.

Mr. BARNHART. Why should not the gentleman from California introduce that through the basket in the regular way?

Mr. RAKER. It is not in the basket clause.

Mr. BARNHART. I am serious about it.

Mr. RAKER. I am serious about it.

Mr. BARNHART. Why does not the gentleman introduce it in the regular way?

Mr. RAKER. I want to get it in in this way, to show that the people of California are anxious to recognize and are in favor of this constitutional amendment proposed to the people prohibiting polygamy, so that they might vote upon it. They are interested in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to insert a letter as a part of his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the letter?

The CHAIRMAN. In reference to polygamy.

Mr. MANN. We have a rule that nothing shall come in this debate except that relating to the bill, although I think it might come in on this bill which they say has plural wives.

Mr. BARNHART. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk. I do not know it is in order at this time, because it is an amendment to the second paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at present, the Chair will state to the gentleman. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the paragraph which is pending.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment——

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman suspend? I want to inquire, if possible—we have had four or five hours debate on this section, and I would like to see if we could not arrive at some time for concluding debate on the second paragraph.

Mr. MANN. We would like about 45 minutes.

Mr. HULINGS. I understand the gentleman's amendment is to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chairman understands.

Mr. HULINGS. My amendment is to insert.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has the floor at the present time.

Mr. HULINGS. The gentleman's amendment is to strike out, while the amendment I present is to perfect the section, and I assume it has precedence.

The CHAIRMAN. Such an amendment as the gentleman indicates would be a preferential amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the second paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 80 minutes, 40 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota and 40 minutes by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the second section and all amendments thereto be closed in 80 minutes, 40 minutes to be controlled by himself and 40 by the gentleman from Minnesota. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have an amendment I think is fairly important; it may not appear so to the rest of the committee; but I would like to make it certain that I may have 5 or 10 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. I can not agree to the gentleman having 10 minutes. There are a great many gentlemen who would want to have 10 minutes. We have given 80 minutes to a discussion of this section, and I think that is plenty of time.

Mr. MANN. I think we occupied three or four hours on it one day two or three years ago, when I had charge of the bill.

Mr. WEBB. I am very glad we are making such excellent progress now. I am sure that 80 minutes is time enough to discuss this.

Mr. FERRIS. I will not object; but if there are eight amendments, that would give eight Members 10 minutes apiece.

Mr. WEBB. I could not agree to give the gentleman 10 minutes, but he will have some time to discuss his amendment.

Mr. CARLIN. And the gentleman is only entitled to five minutes under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to say to the chairman of the committee my colleague has an amendment he proposes to offer to the same paragraph. Would that come in under the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. WEBB. It would be if it were offered. The gentleman will have time to present his amendment. I will be glad to have the Chairman put the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 80 minutes, one half of that time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object for a moment, I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary a question. I hope it is not arranged so that all the time shall be taken up on one amendment and requiring that the other amendments be voted down in rotation. Now the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] comes along with an amendment to strike out the whole paragraph.

Mr. MANN. That is not my amendment, to begin with. But other amendments take precedence over it, among them that of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman while he is on his feet. I want to suggest to gentlemen who have amendments already prepared that they send them to the desk and there have them read, so that they can be included in the debate.

Mr. MANN. I hope this will not be taken out of my time. I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the time to yield to gentlemen to offer amendments. I am perfectly willing to delay, so far as I am concerned, until those amendments are disposed of.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma half a minute and to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. VAUGHAN] half a minute in which to offer amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is recognized.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. It is to be considered as pending?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. He offers the amendment, if it is in order, to perfect the text.

Mr. FERRIS. I thought the gentleman from Illinois wanted to go ahead.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, would it not be better if these amendments were offered in connection with the remarks of the gentleman from Oklahoma and other gentlemen?

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield, I will recognize each one of these gentlemen to offer amendments.

Mr. MANN. I will yield.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, let my amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FERRIS:

"Page 24, line 24, after the word 'rates,' insert the following proviso: 'Provided, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any corporation or any person or persons to transport the products of any mine or mines, including coal, oil, gas, or hydroelectric energy, either by rail, water, pipe line, transmission line, or otherwise from one State, Territory, or District of the United States to another State, Territory, or District of the United States, or to any foreign country, who shall not become a common carrier within the meaning and purposes of and subject to the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887.'"

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane. It does not sound germane from the reading of it.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to be heard on that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have sent to the desk an amendment already.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has made a point of order on my amendment. I want to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] did not have the floor.

Mr. HULINGS. I had the floor to offer an amendment and was recognized by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that an agreement was made by the committee to limit debate on this section.

Mr. HULINGS. I did not want to be run over; that is all.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I hope argument on the point of order will not be taken out of my time. I want to be heard on the point of order.

This bill is to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies and combinations for unlawful purposes. This particular paragraph deals with common carriers and interlocking directorates and traffic arrangements.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there is nothing about interlocking directorates and traffic arrangements in this paragraph.

Mr. FERRIS. Listen a moment and let us determine who is right. This section provides:

Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid associations of traffic, operating, accounting, or other officers of common carriers for the purpose of conferring among themselves or of making any lawful agreement as to any matter which is subject to the regulating or supervisory jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but all such matters shall continue to be subject to such jurisdiction of the commission, and all such agreements shall be entered and kept of record by the carriers, parties thereto, and shall at all times be open to inspection by the commission: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as modifying existing laws prohibiting the pooling of earnings or traffic, or existing laws against joint agreements by common carriers to maintain rates.

The amendment I have offered, Mr. Chairman, is to amend and supplement the antitrust laws of the United States, and has to do with the particular paragraph under consideration, and has to do with the particular bill now pending before the House. Nothing can be more germane, nothing could be more in order, dealing precisely with the proposition of carrying in interstate business, and with the proposition laid down in this section and even in the title of the bill.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. WEBB. Is not that very question now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal from the State of Oklahoma, and is not the decision of that court expected on the 8th of this month?

Mr. FERRIS. It is. But this is to strengthen the law the Commerce Court sought to destroy. The Interstate Commerce Commission has for a long time been trying to bring pipe lines under their own jurisdiction, and they instituted a series of proceedings on their own motion to bring that about. The Prairie Oil & Gas Co., with others, went in and enjoined the commission, and I hold in my hand the decision in the Prairie Oil & Gas case, which was decided by the Commerce Court, and I think the dissenting opinion by Judge Mack is the correct law and ought to be the law; but I fear that the Supreme Court will not uphold the decision of the Commerce Court, and I want to write this amendment into the law so we will be sure to get relief. This amendment was submitted to Secretary Lane, who probably knows more about this matter than most of us here, and he is heartily in favor of the adoption of such a principle. This is too important to pass by lightly.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, our view is that while this amendment may be germane to some portion of the bill, it certainly is not germane to this particular paragraph of this section, which exempts certain traffic arrangements from the operation of the antitrust law.

In addition to that, the gentlemen from Oklahoma ought not to undertake to take two bites at the same cherry. They have submitted their controversy to the highest court in the land, and they ought to wait until the 8th day of this month, when the proceeding will probably be terminated, before they ask to put something new into this bill, and particularly in this paragraph of this section.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. You expect to pass this bill before the 8th of this month, do you not?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; and you expect this decision by the 8th.

Mr. CARTER. Suppose you do not get the decision by the 8th of this month, and then this bill is passed?

Mr. WEBB. There is another branch of this lawmaking body where the gentleman may have his amendment offered.

Mr. CARTER. We should be very glad to offer it there, but we have not the privileges over there which we have in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph under consideration provides that nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid associations of traffic, operating, accounting, or other officers of common carriers for the purpose of conferring among themselves or of making lawful agreements, and so forth. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr.

FERRIS] provides that it shall be unlawful for any corporation or person or persons to transport the products of any mine or mines, including coal, and so forth, unless they become common carriers under the act of 1887. The Chair fails to see how the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma can be germane to this particular paragraph. It may be entirely germane to other sections of the bill which have not yet been reached, but upon that the Chair is not now called upon to rule.

Mr. FERRIS. If the Chair has any doubt about it, I confess that the section has two independent propositions in it. The first is purely a labor proposition, and the second is a carrier proposition. I will offer it as a separate section, section 7½, and will strike out the word "provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is not in order to offer it as a separate section now, because we are considering section 7.

Mr. FERRIS. The chairman of the committee a moment ago, in answer to a question asked of him, said he was of the opinion that an amendment offered as a separate section would constitute an amendment to this paragraph and would come within the rule. If the Chair thinks otherwise, I will offer it as soon as the paragraph is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that as long as there are any amendments to be offered to this particular paragraph it will be out of order to offer the amendment which the gentleman from Oklahoma proposes. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FERRIS. I will withdraw the amendment at this time and will ask the Clerk to have it returned to me.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. VAUGHAN].

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the close of section 7 the following paragraph:
"Nothing in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid persons operating local telephone exchanges engaged in commerce from selling their local exchanges to competitors for local business or from acquiring local exchanges from competitors for local business when such sale or acquisition is not forbidden by any law of the State or locality where the exchange is situated and competition in the transmission of interstate toll messages is not interrupted nor interfered with."

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against that amendment at this point. I do not think it is germane to this section or paragraph.

Mr. VAUGHAN. I think it is germane, and I should like to be heard on the point of order, but I would not like to have it taken out of my five minutes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me?

Mr. VAUGHAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose this as a separate paragraph or section?

Mr. VAUGHAN. I offer it as a separate paragraph to this section.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I make the point of order that it is not germane to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the amendment of the gentleman from Texas is in order at this time. It is not germane to the paragraph which is now under consideration.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on that for a moment, and to suggest that this paragraph proposes to exempt certain transactions from the operation of the antitrust laws.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. VAUGHAN. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman that it seems to me if it is germane anywhere, it is germane to the section relating to holding companies, which is section 8. I will state to the gentleman that there are a number of exceptions in that section, and it seems to me that section 8 is the one that will make unlawful the transactions that the gentleman desires to exempt, if anything in this bill does make them unlawful, so that there would be the proper place to offer it, provided, of course, it should be held to be germane at that point.

Mr. VAUGHAN. That being the case I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment now and offer it to section 8.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, permission will be granted to withdraw the amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 21, strike out the colon after the word "commission" and insert a comma and the following:
"But no such agreement shall go into effect or become operative until the same shall have first been submitted to and approved of by the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to understand whether we are now operating under the agreement that this debate is a part of the 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me in reading this paragraph that as it stands it would give authority to these traffic associations to make pooling arrangements or lawful agreements as to any matter which is subject to the regulating or supervisory jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but it does not distinctly give the Interstate Commerce Commission authority over the rule or the agreement that is made.

Mr. WEBB. I should like to make a statement. It was the idea of the committee that these agreements could not go into operation until they were O. K'd by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HULINGS. I presume so.

Mr. WEBB. We think that is a reasonable conclusion to draw from the section or paragraph.

Mr. HULINGS. I doubt whether the language is clear.

Mr. WEBB. That was our intention.

Mr. HULINGS. The amendment makes that thoroughly clear, and I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WEBB. I call the attention of my friend to the fact that this agreement is subject to the regulation or supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HULINGS. No. There is just where I think the failure is. The agreement is not subject. The matter about which the agreement may be made is subject to the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WEBB. Of course the association is under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HULINGS. In my judgment it requires the amendment to make it clear.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is not this the distinction between the provision in the bill and the gentleman's amendment: That under the gentleman's amendment the agreement to fix rates before it goes into effect must be approved by the commission, and under the bill the rates go into effect and after that the commission may revise the rates?

Mr. HULINGS. That is precisely the point.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the committee wants to be perfectly frank with the House on both sides. If there is any doubt about the intent and scope of the provisions in the bill we want to accept the amendment so as to make it perfectly clear.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, we will gladly accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not occupy all the time yielded to me for the reason that I desired to submit an amendment to the same effect as that offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS]. I congratulate the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] for presenting an amendment that is acceptable to the committee and the committee for accepting the amendment. There is no question whatever but what it was absolutely necessary that such an amendment should be adopted in order to protect the people and to carry out the purpose and intent of the section. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from Iowa, I was about to offer the same amendment, and like him I wish to congratulate the members of the committee on accepting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS]. But, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the members of the committee one or two questions with reference to the paragraph as it stands. It reads:

Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid associations of traffic, operating, accounting, or other officers of common carriers for the purpose of conferring among themselves or of making any lawful agreement.

Now, I would like information wherein the antitrust laws now can possibly prohibit the conferring together and making of any lawful agreement.

Mr. WEBB. I want to say to the gentleman that we think the trust laws would not apply to that condition of affairs, but the Interstate Commerce Commission thought we ought to make the thing perfectly clear, and therefore the section.

Mr. CARLIN The mere meeting is thought by many to come within the law and might be construed to be a combination, and they want to make it clear, and that is the object of the provision.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, they may have in mind the fact that when the law regulating railroad rates was passed four years ago, as gentlemen will recall, a lot of railroad officials met, and it was proposed to raise the rates in advance of the passage of the law. The bill under consideration provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission might suspend the proposed rates. President Taft threatened to have proceedings begun under the Sherman antitrust law and indict these people, whereupon the rates went glimmering. I suppose this is designed to allow them to do the thing that they tried to do then.

Mr. LENROOT. I remember the circumstances very well, and it was the Sherman law alone that prevented the increase of rates at that time until the amended law went into effect so as to permit suspension. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, this is in the disjunctive. The antitrust laws do not prohibit the making of any lawful agreement. They do not do that now; of course not. But the gentleman says that the conferring among themselves may be a violation of the Sherman law, and they wish to permit such conferences.

Mr. Chairman, if the conferences lead to something that means a violation of law, they ought to be subject to the antitrust laws.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will state that in the opinion of the committee these meetings of the traffic managers and officers of railroads are absolutely essential in order that officers and managers of different railroads may carry on business without friction and without complication and without annoyance to the traveling public. They must understand each other, and since the laws regulating interstate commerce have been on the statute books they have been compelled by the necessities and the nature of their business to have these meetings, conferences, and enter into arrangements; and yet they have felt that possibly under the strict interpretation of the Sherman law, if they were ever charged in the courts with a violation of the law, they might be held guilty of a violation of the Sherman Act. This is intended to lift them from under the ban of the existing law and to allow them to meet, confer, and understand each other, and to make any lawful agreements; but the exceptions in the provision expressly provide that their agreements shall still be subject to the regulation and power of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The amendment which we have just adopted, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, makes that clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin five minutes more.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, now, to recall a little of the history in connection with this same question, this identical proposition was up four years ago, in 1910. I then took quite an active part in securing an amendment almost identical with the one which has now been adopted. Another amendment which was also adopted prohibited any agreement of any character between railroads which were directly competing with each other. These amendments, with the assistance of the solid Democratic side of the House, were incorporated as a part of the Mann bill.

After we had improved the bill in that respect, improved it more and to a greater extent than this section now stands, a motion was then made to strike the entire section out of the bill, and that motion prevailed, and every Democrat, I believe, voted "aye," so that the provision went out of the Mann bill; and I am, I confess, a little surprised to find that it again creeps into this bill, brought in by the Democratic Party, who were then unanimously opposed to it. I am frank to say that, with the amendment just adopted, I have such confidence in the Interstate Commerce Commission that I do not know that the public interests will be injured if this remains in the bill, but certainly it was a most dangerous proposition before the adoption or the acceptance of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS]. I voted to strike it all out in 1910, and I shall vote to strike it out to-day, because, I may add, I can see no possible good to come from it in the way in which it is framed. So far as lawful agreements are concerned, they are permitted now. You have accomplished nothing there. So far as conferences are concerned, they are not under the ban of the law now unless there is something injurious to the public interest going on in those conferences, and if there is, I know of no reason why they should not be under the ban of the law.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, many of the practices of interstate carriers, if the Sherman antitrust law were strictly construed, would be held subject to the penalties of the act. Those violations have been blinked at, however, to a certain extent. The necessity for some conference agreements has long been recognized, provided such conference agreements were subjected to the supervisory control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in this very provision in this bill the committee is practically seeking to carry out a recommendation contained in the Republican platform of 1908, which reads as follows:

We believe, however, that the interstate-commerce law should be further amended so as to give railroads the right to make public traffic agreements, subject to the approval of the commission, but maintaining always the principle of competition between naturally competing lines and avoiding the common control of such lines by any means whatsoever.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, just adopted, carries out that further suggestion—that such conference agreements should be subject to the regulatory power of the Interstate Commerce Commission. President Taft, in his special message to Congress on January 7, 1910, wherein he recommended to Congress amendments to the interstate-commerce act, stated, among other things, as follows:

The subject of agreements between carriers with respect to rates has been often discussed in Congress. Pooling arrangements and agreements were condemned by the general sentiment of the people, and, under the Sherman antitrust law, any agreement between carriers operating in restraint of interstate or international trade or commerce would be unlawful. The Republican platform of 1908 expressed the belief that the interstate-commerce law should be further amended so as to give the railroads the right to make and publish traffic agreements subject to the approval of the commission, but maintaining always the principle of competition between naturally competing lines and avoiding the common control of such lines by any means whatsoever. In view of the complete control ever rate making and other practices of interstate carriers established by the acts of Congress and as recommended in this communication, I see no reason why agreements between carriers subject to the act, specifying the classifications of freight and the rates, fares, and charges for transportation of passengers and freight which they may agree to establish, should not be permitted, provided copies of such agreements be promptly filed with the commission, but subject to all the provisions of the interstate-commerce act, and subject to the right of any parties to such agreement to cancel it as to all or any of the agreed rates, fares, charges, or classifications by 30 days' notice in writing to the other parties and to the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this proposition now before us revives old times to me. I reported into the House four years ago a bill which became the amendment to the interstate-commerce act of 1910, containing a provision somewhat similar but better guarded than the one that is in this bill. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had jurisdiction of the subject matter, and knew something about it. The present proposition comes in a bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, which has never made any investigation of railroad matters, and I assume does not pretend to know very much about the subject. It was not in the bill as originally drafted. There were a great many committee prints of this bill, and this never appeared in one of the committee prints. Mr. Clayton introduced a bill in the House on April 14, 1914, of which the present bill is the issue, and this provision was not in that Clayton bill introduced on April 14. It had never been suggested to the Committee on the Judiciary, so far as I can learn, that any proposition of this kind should be put into the antitrust bill until just before the bill was reported. The committee, having decided to incorporate in the bill a provision exempting labor organizations and farmers' organizations from the operation of the antitrust law, concluded that it would even up the situation by a provision exempting railroads from the operation of the antitrust law.

What are the facts? The railroads everywhere do have some kind of an understanding as to rates between competitive points. I suppose it would be impossible between two points, where each of two railroads ran, for one to have one rate and the other to have a different rate. They have always in some way gotten together. Four years ago I proposed in the administration bill to insert a provision practically taken from the Republican platform authorizing railroads to make these agreements, the rates when made to be subject to the operation of law. This provision goes a little further than that in behalf of the railroads. This provision authorizes the officers of common carriers to confer among themselves without any restriction and without any limitation. There is a restriction now inserted in the bill that the rates they make must be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but the right to confer is made absolute. You do not need anything more. They never need to make a rate by agreement when they can confer. The heads of a dozen railroads get together and stick their legs under the mahogany and say the rate from New York to Chicago shall be raised so much on a certain class of freight. There is no agreement necessary. All they need is the power to confer. There is no limitation in this section on the power to confer.

If they make an agreement and write it out, why, they have to submit that to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but after they confer each one goes out and has a rate sheet filed raising the rate. There is no agreement, only a conference, and the rate goes into effect.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is just as it was with the Steel Trust, which had its banquets and conferences.

Mr. MANN. Yes. Now, these conferences to-day are under the ban of the antitrust law. When the act of four years ago was to be passed and put upon the statute books, an act which gave the power to the commission to suspend a proposed rate, the railroads met, or their officials did, and after a conference each one said to himself or to somebody else, we will raise the rate. It was announced in the papers the rates were to be raised, but President Taft directed the Attorney General to file an injunction proceeding at St. Louis to restrain the railroads from putting into effect the proposed rates, and there was in addition a prosecution under the criminal provisions of the law, and the railroads quit. But they would have that power under this. Now, do not misunderstand me. I reported the provision of four years ago, not so strongly in favor of railroads in that bill as in this bill, and thereupon the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union made various amendments to the section, one of them very similar to the amendment just agreed to, called the Hulings amendment. We inserted in that section this provision:

Provided, That the proposed agreement before being made, and the rates, fares, charges, and classifications specified therein, shall be presented to and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

That amendment was agreed to. The distinguished Chairman of the present Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which committee has jurisdiction of these matters, then the ranking Democratic member of my committee, made these few remarks on the subject of this legislation, among others:

Now, what is the object of this thing? The object of it is plainly not to benefit the people; it is not intended to apply to rates at any points except competitive points. The way stations by thousands along single lines of road, with no competition, will never be benefited. They may appeal and pray for help, but they will never get it under this section or any other of that sort. The whole object of it is to enable carriers to agree upon a stable basis of rates that they will all work under and not begin to compete one with the other. That is all there is to it.

The present chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], is one of the best-posted men in this country on the subject of railroad legislation. He has been on the committee studying it now for nearly 18 years. That was the Democratic view which he expressed at that time. And, again, he said:

I was proceeding to say that the desire of these carriers is to escape competition and underbidding at competitive points only. They can only do that by agreeing upon an ironclad system of rates that they will all stick to. Of course that would be in violation of the antitrust law, because it prevents carriers from bidding against each other; but would it benefit even the competitive points—

And so forth.

And there is another very distinguished Member of this House who has been for some time a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, who was then and is now a Democratic Member from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], and he had this to say about this proposition which the Democratic committee has now reported:

It was boldly admitted by the gentleman from Illinois—that this section does repeal and render nugatory so much of the Sherman antitrust law as applies to these agreements. Does any gentleman in this House want to go out and ask for a renomination or a reelection to this House admitting that he would willfully and with full knowledge vote to repeal pro tanto the antitrust law in any respect?

That was myself—

And the committee after inserting what was then called the Martin amendment, along the same lines as the Hulings amendment here, had another amendment proposed. Mr. Kendall, of Iowa, offered this amendment:

Provided, That in considering agreements contemplated by this section due regard shall be had in the maintenance of the principle of competition between natural competitive carriers, and no such agreement shall be approved between the carriers directly and substantially competitive with each other.

That is not in the pending proposition, and that was inserted in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and after that came the amendment of my colleague [Mr. MADDEN], who has a similar motion pending here, to strike out the section which was No. 7, as this is No. 7, and we had a vote upon that. The committee divided, and there were ayes 102, noes 102. The amendment was not agreed to at that point. Tellers were asked for, and on tellers there were ayes 110, noes 91, and every Democrat in this House voted "aye," and every insurgent Republican—that is what they were called then—voted "aye."

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. To strike out?

Mr. MANN. To strike out; and that was one of those times, which were not very numerous on propositions of that kind, when the gentleman from Illinois, in charge of the bill, got very badly licked. Just before this provision was stricken out in this bill in the House under these circumstances, a provision which then had been made much more beneficial to the people than this, the Senate considered a similar Senate bill and had stricken out the same section in the Senate. Of course, I can not comment upon how the individual Senators voted over there, but if I were not in a legislative body here I could say that every Democratic Senator voted to strike out. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, we have a provision brought in here by the committee which did not have jurisdiction of it, without consideration by the committee, to reverse the unanimous action of the Democratic side of this House four years ago, and the question with me is whether you have learned more and know more or whether you have forgotten what you did in the past. My distinguished friend from North Carolina might suggest that a committee with little knowledge on the subject found it easier to handle it than did a committee that had a great deal of knowledge on the subject.

The railroads have been trying to get this provision into the law ever since I have been a Member of this House. The Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and its counsel in every bill which has been suggested to be brought before this House on the subject of railroad legislation have asked that this provision be put into it. It has been suggested time and time again. The Interstate Commerce Commission has suggested it and urged it. President Taft urged it. President Roosevelt urged it. The railroads have all been for it. I do not say that it is a bad provision, because I supported a very similar one four years ago, although that one was better than this; but Congress, in close touch with the people and the shippers, has never been swerved from its opinion on this subject by the attitude of the men here who had been argued with by the big railroad officials.

The provision does destroy every semblance of competition between the railroads. It is true that the Interstate Commerce Commission has control over the railroad rates, but when this provision goes into the law there is no longer any competition. Now, competition is not merely over rates. Competition is largely over business, and while we never have proposed a pooling permit under the law, under this provision authorizing the railroad officials to confer lawfully they can make any sort of a conference or understanding they please in regard to rates or in regard to quantities of freight. But, of course, they will not be able to make a lawful agreement where they can find one railroad that does not live up to the agreement. Under the old system where railroads entered into these agreements there was a penalty imposed when a railroad broke the agreement. They can not make such an agreement as that unless it be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but they can make their conferences and agreements in honor among themselves as they please.

And, after all, gentlemen, if you vote this in, do not ever chide me again. There never was a provision more bitterly opposed in this House than was this provision when I reported it four years ago. It takes you gentlemen on that side some time to catch up. I do not know that I am personally proud of being the leader of the Democratic side of the House four years in advance. Although I have pride in the Democratic membership, it takes four years for that membership to catch up. If you keep on you may catch up with the other good things I have proposed, but which you have voted down. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion whether under this phraseology railroads could enter into agreements as to rates and other matters for 50 years, and if it had the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission it would be binding upon the railroads for that time or a longer time?

Mr. MANN. Well, you will notice they have left out of this provision a provision which was in the bill which I reported to the House, which was in effect that they could not enforce these agreements; that is, that an agreement entered into might be withdrawn at any time without penalty on the part of any railroad. But there is no limitation in this, as I recall it. Here is an agreement which, if the Interstate Commerce Commission approves, is binding, although it may place a penalty of a million dollars upon the railroad company which fails to live up to the agreement.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman again yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If this section is enacted in its present form, is there any object in enacting the next section, which is intended to prevent the acquirement by holding companies of competing railroads?

Mr. MANN. Well, I will not undertake to say about that.

Mr. GARNER. I want to ascertain whether the gentleman is in favor of this second paragraph in section 7.

Mr. MANN. Well, if the gentleman is here—as he seldom is [laughter]—when we vote, the gentleman will find out.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is making an argument now which consumes considerable time, instructing the House and its Members how they shall follow him, and I want to find out whether he is in favor of this, so that I can follow him. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. It contains considerable instruction, too.

Mr. GARNER. It has nothing to do with the merits of this law.

Mr. MANN. How is the distinguished gentleman from Texas going to vote?

Mr. GARNER. I am waiting for the gentleman from Illinois to indicate how he will vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. You usually vote four years after I do.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. Under the present arrangement there is nothing to prevent any of these railroads or their officers from conferring if they do not do anything, is there, under the present law?

Mr. MANN. If they confer for the purpose of raising rates, they are guilty under the law, or for the purpose of doing anything else that is in restraint of trade.

Mr. HULINGS. Can the railroads raise rates without the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MANN. They can not raise the rates if the commission suspends the rates, but ordinarily the rates are not suspended. The railway company files a rate sheet that goes into effect 30 days after it is filed unless the commission issues an order extending the time in which it shall go into effect. Then it may be extended for 10 months.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. I ask this question for my own information and enlightenment. The evidence adduced at the time of the investigation of the United States Steel Corporation shows that the Interstate Commerce Commission is aware of the fact that railroad traffic agreements exist, and that it utilizes those agreements and that no one objects. Now, does this wording which is proposed here, this proposed change in the law, permit more than that which already exists as a matter of practice?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it goes further than what now exists, although what now exists is contrary to law.

Mr. GARDNER. Does it go substantially further?

Mr. MANN. It goes substantially further.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. CARLIN. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] so much time as he may need.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I hardly know how to answer his position, because I have been unable to discover what it is; but I want to say to the gentleman that assuming everything he has said about the record vote on the proposition four years ago to be correct—and I do not question his statement, although I have not looked it up—we who voted against it four years ago will be no more inconsistent in voting for it now than he who proposed it four years ago is inconsistent in offering a motion to strike it out.

Mr. MANN. I did not offer a motion to strike it out.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MANN. My colleague, Mr. MADDEN, offered the motion this time and four years ago.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I misunderstood the parliamentary situation.

Now, I desire to make this explanation: We have not considered this bill in the light of what we may have done in the past upon these questions, but the committee in charge of this bill have endeavored to bring in legislation that would be of value, and if there are any defects in the present law we have endeavored to remove those defects by appropriate legislation.

Now, the gentleman says that the Committee on the Judiciary has not jurisdiction of this proposition. I desire to take issue with the gentleman on that proposition. If such conferences or agreements are unlawful, they are unlawful by virtue of the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, and under the rules of this House the Committee on the Judiciary has jurisdiction over that question. This matter was brought to the attention of the Subcommittee on the Judiciary having the bill in charge, and it was thoroughly investigated.

The matter was brought to our attention by representatives of the railroads, who explained that in the very nature of things they were compelled to meet, compelled to have these conferences, compelled to make arrangements, in order to carry on and conduct the traffic business of the railroads in the interest of the general public and to prevent conflicts and frictions in their dealings with the public; that it was necessary to have these conferences and meetings, and that since the enactment of laws upon the subject of interstate commerce they had been having these meetings; and yet, with their knowledge of the Sherman law and of the interpretations placed upon that law by the courts, they had always felt that if the Government should proceed against them under the terms of the Sherman law they might be adjudged guilty of a crime and punished for doing what the very nature of their business and the interest of the public require them to do.

But we did not depend upon the representations of the railroad people. We then took the matter up with the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has jurisdiction over this matter. While we did not go to the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House for information on that subject, we went to the great body of men, the Interstate Commerce Commission, who for years have been administering the affairs of interstate railroads, to the great advantage and to the general satisfaction of the public, and obtained their views upon the subject; and I desire to say that the provision reported in this bill was drawn by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and will be found in a letter of James S. Harlan, chairman of the commission, which letter I will put into the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. I will read the provision which was so drawn by the Interstate Commerce Commission:

Nor shall anything contained herein or in said antitrust law be construed to forbid associations of traffic, operating, accounting, or other officers of common carriers for the purpose of conferring among themselves or of making any lawful agreement as to any matter which is subject to the regulating or supervisory jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but all such matters shall continue to be subject to such jurisdiction of the commission and all such agreements shall be entered and kept of record by the carriers parties thereto, and shall at all times be open to inspection by the commission: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as modifying existing laws prohibiting the pooling of earnings or traffic, or existing laws against joint agreements by common carriers to maintain rates.

After this matter was brought to our attention, after we brought it to the attention of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they had approved the proviso in the language which I have read to you, we incorporated that provision into the bill, instead of the provision that was incorporated in the bill originally, and the provision that we bring before you has the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I have no apology to offer for the position of the committee upon this question. We have been endeavoring to bring in this legislation in such form that it will be beneficial to the business interests of this country and beneficial to the American people. If the Sherman law has been so interpreted as to work harm, or to prevent legitimate or necessary things, your committee believes it ought to be amended. We believe that it has been so interpreted in regard to fraternal, labor, farmers', and other associations. We brought in a provision to relieve those associations; and we believed also, when this matter was brought to our attention, when we understood the facts, that the railroads were entitled to relief in this respect; and we compliment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on being in advance of us, if he thinks this provision is right. In the preparation of this bill we did not hesitate to seek and obtain information from any source, and I disclaim that in any provision of this bill we acted from any narrow point of view, or that we hesitated to do a thing in the interest of capital or business, when we were convinced that the demands of justice required it.

Now, I desire to submit at this point two letters from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, James S. Harlan, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

The letters are as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, April 22, 1914.

Hon. H. D. CLAYTON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date inclosing confidential committee print of a bill offered by you to supplement existing trust laws. Immediately upon its receipt I called a conference of my colleagues, but in view of the absence of Commissioners Clements and Clark from the city we were not able to reach a conclusion this afternoon. I hope to convey to you the views of the commission early to-morrow afternoon.

Permit me to call your attention to the clause beginning in line 4 on page 6. It reads:

"But any agreement in the premises shall likewise continue," etc.

It occurs to me that the meaning would be made more clear by substituting:

"But any such matter that shall be made the subject of agreement by any such association shall likewise," etc. In other words, as I assume, it is the subject matter of the agreement and not the agreement itself that ought to continue under our regulating or supervisory jurisdiction.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES S. HARLAN, Chairman.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, April 24, 1914.

Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Further acknowledging your letter of the 22d, inclosing a copy of the confidential committee print of a bill to supplement existing trust laws, and calling our attention to certain language in it commencing at the foot of page 5 and continuing through line 6 on page 6, I beg to say that the bill has had consideration by the commission.

We do not understand that the provision in any degree modifies existing laws forbidding the consolidation or merger of railroad corporations operating competing lines, but that it is intended to go no further than to legalize associations of officials of common carriers organized for the purpose of agreeing upon rates, classifications, operating rules, accounting, and other similar matters now subject to the jurisdiction of this commission.

Such associations have been in active existence for many years. They have stated and special meetings at which matters within our jurisdiction are the subject of discussion and conference and not infrequently of actual agreement; and often when no positive and affirmative agreement is reached such conferences are nevertheless followed by a concert of action among the participating carriers. These facts have been shown in contested cases before us, the testimony being offered by the complainants on the general theory that such agreements are unlawful. The commission, however, has never based any order on the hypothesis of unlawfulness in the action taken by the carriers as the result of any such conference or agreement, except in so far as any such agreement or concert of action might have some bearing upon the reasonableness or general lawfulness of the rate or practice in dispute before us.

The increasing stability in rates now observable in our transportation service results to no small extent from the conferences of the traffic associations of carriers. As a practical matter, therefore, we see no objection to what is sought by the provision in question. We do not understand that it is intended to modify the provisions of law forbidding carriers to enter into any contract or combination for the pooling of traffic or earnings, or to modify the prohibitions of law against agreements by which one carrier undertakes not to change a rate or rates except upon the consent of one or more other carriers. But to avoid any confusion on these points the following paragraph is suggested as a substitute for the paragraph of the bill commencing with line 24 on page 5:

"Nor shall anything contained herein or in said antitrust laws be construed to forbid associations of traffic, operating, accounting, or other officers of common carriers for the purpose of conferring among themselves or of making any lawful agreement as to any matter which is subject to the regulating or supervisory jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but all such matters shall continue to be subject to such jurisdiction of the commission, and all such agreements shall be entered and kept of record by the carriers parties thereto and shall at all times be open to inspection by the commission: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as modifying existing laws prohibiting the pooling of earnings or traffic or existing laws against joint agreements by common carriers to maintain rates."

You will observe that the substitute above proposed embodies a clause requiring carriers to make a record of the agreements and understandings of their associations and to keep them open to inspection.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES S. HARLAN, Chairman.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GARNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5168. An act for the relief of the King Theological Hall and authorizing the conveyance of real estate to the Howard University and other grantees;

S. 5254. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior in his discretion to sell and convey a certain tract of land to the Mandan Town and Country Club; and

S. 5673. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5168. An act for the relief of the King Theological Hall, and authorizing the conveyance of real estate to the Howard University and other grantees; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 5254. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior in his discretion to sell and convey a certain tract of land to the Mandan Town and Country Club; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 5673. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 21, noes 36.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is too late to offer an amendment under the agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Oklahoma is to offer a new section, but withholds that until the gentleman from Iowa can offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the section strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following:

"Or authorize competing lines to make agreements with reference to the rates which shall be charged or the services rendered."

Mr. CARLIN. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that all time on this paragraph has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, did I have any time left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had one minute.

Mr. MANN. I yield that one minute to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is all I want. I only desire to say a word with reference to this amendment. It is claimed here that the purpose of this bill is to further competition and not to restrain it. If this section is adopted as it stands, it will absolutely nullify the following section, which provides that holding companies may not hold or control competing lines. If gentlemen wish, in fact, to still preserve the competition feature of the present law, this amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 24, line 21, after the word "Commission," insert these words: "and any Member of Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that an amendment has been offered at that particular place and adopted by the committee.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not understand that the amendment as I have offered it has ever been offered to this part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 21, after the word "Commission," add the following: "and any Member of Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOWLER) there were—ayes 8, noes 16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 24, line 24, after the word "rates," add the following:
"Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as applying to associations of manufacturers conducted purely for profit and not for their health or for pleasure.

[Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further amendments to this paragraph. If not, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have hesitated to offer an amendment to this section, because the Committee on the Judiciary have done so well, and I commend them for their good work and I am in sympathy with many of the provisions of the bill. But I wish to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 24, after the word "rates," insert the following as a new section:
"SEC 7a. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any corporation or any person or persons to transport the products of any mine or mines, including coal, oil, gas, or hydroelectric energy, either by rail, water, pipe line, transmission line, or otherwise, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States to any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or to any foreign country, who shall not become a common carrier within the meaning and purposes of and subject to the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887."

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that. I do not think it is germane.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the point of order comes too late. The amendment has been debated.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, it has just been reported.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, but it has been reported heretofore, and the point of order comes too late.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the point of order was raised and sustained when the same thing was offered as an amendment to the second paragraph of section 7. It was then withdrawn with a view of offering it as a new section, and the gentleman now offers it as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the point of order was sustained when it was offered as an amendment to section 7. The gentleman now offers it as a new section.

Mr. FERRIS. And I proceeded to debate it, and did debate it, and after that some one asked that it be reported.

Mr. STAFFORD. But it was not reported.

Mr. FERRIS. It had been reported before, as I think the Chair will remember.

Mr. HARRISON. It had been offered as an amendment to the other paragraph.

Mr. BARTLETT. But it is offered now as a new section. It was withheld while these other amendments were offered.

Mr. HARRISON. It could not have been offered as a new section until now.

The CHAIRMAN. The RECORD shows that the amendment had not been reported. It was reported when it was offered as an amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. FERRIS. The Chair is not holding that it had not been read? It was read when I first offered it.

Mr. CARLIN. It was read out of place and out of time.

The CHAIRMAN. It was offered at that time as an amendment to the second section of paragraph 7, and it went out on a point of order. The gentleman now offers it again, and the Clerk has just reported it. What is the point of order made by the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill; that we have not undertaken in this bill, or in any paragraph of it, to regulate or define common carriers, but have been dealing with a criminal statute. What the gentleman seeks to amend is within the jurisdiction of another committee. This legislation is supplementary to the Sherman antitrust act regulating trusts and monopolies in restraint of trade. There is not a paragraph in it in which we undertake to assume jurisdiction over common carriers or to regulate in any way common carriers or define who shall be deemed common carriers or who shall not be deemed common carriers. The second paragraph of section 7, while it mentions common carriers, relates to certain agreements, conferences, or arrangements by common carriers, and is inserted for the specific purpose of relieving them from the operation of the Sherman antitrust law as a criminal statute in regard to such, and for no other purpose, and we submit that the amendment is not germane to any portion of this bill. That is a matter under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Committee. That is the committee that ought to deal with the matter embodied in this amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma proposes to amend the act of February 4, 1887, which is the Interstate Commerce Commission act, and this bill does not propose to amend that.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. There is not a paragraph in the bill that undertakes to amend the provisions of law relating to common carriers or the Interstate Commerce Commission act. We are dealing simply with the Sherman Act.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the very first section of the bill, on page 19, which begins with line 15, specifically amends three different statutes wholly foreign to this bill. Section 7, the very paragraph that we have just concluded, in the second paragraph of it, specifically deals with common carriers. The gentleman in charge of the bill on the Judiciary Committee says that they did not assume jurisdiction in one breath and in the next breath he asserts that that section relieves common carriers from the laws that we now impose upon them by the Sherman Antitrust Act. I submit to the Chair, if the committee has jurisdiction to relieve common carriers from certain obligations imposed upon them by law, I can not fathom why we have not the same jurisdiction and the same power to impose additional conditions upon them, and if the rule works one way I can not understand how the gentleman could contend that offering this as a new section the committee is without jurisdiction to consider it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this is clearly violative of the rule of germaneness. In order that an amendment be germane it must be not only germane to the paragraph and the section, but germane to the bill and the purposes which the bill has in view. The very face of the amendment itself discloses that it proposes to do something which it is contemplated will put these companies described in this amendment not under the act of 1890, known as the Sherman antitrust law, but under the act of 1887, known as the interstate-commerce law, to regulate common carriers.

Mr. FERRIS. Does not the exemption afforded them on page 24 from lines 11 to 24 to that extent mention the Sherman antitrust law, and on page 19 does not the language from lines 15 to 24 and on over to the next page specifically amend three statutes foreign to this bill; and if not, why not?

It is amazing that the whole bill can be made up of amendments of the various statutes in another section that comes from the existing law in this identical section, and that an amendment trying to do the same thing in another paragraph should be held out of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is amazing that a gentleman of the intelligence of the gentleman from Oklahoma should get on a hobby here and ride it eternally in the House as he has done this proposition.

Mr. FERRIS. It is a pretty good hobby when you are trying to ride the Standard Oil and the water-power trusts.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order I say this bill has reference solely to the creation of an addition to the Sherman antitrust law. The Committee on the Judiciary has no jurisdiction to consider propositions relating to interstate commerce except as to the effect of the law relating to interstate commerce. Now they propose to say—what? That no corporation or person shall not do—what? Shall not transport the products which they produce between the States; who shall not become a common carrier under the act of 1887.

Mr. Chairman, this bill which we are considering does not propose to deal with common carriers at all. There is nothing in it, except this provision; and the second paragraph of section 7, relating to common carriers, has reference to agreements which violate the Sherman antitrust law as was known in what we call the Trans-Missouri Transportation cases and the Traffic Association cases, which happened to be the first consideration of the Sherman law adjudicated by the Supreme Court; so this is an amendment not to the antitrust law, but an amendment to the interstate-commerce law. Upon its very face it declares that they shall not transport their products unless they shall come within the meaning and purpose of the act of 1887, which has no reference to the control or regulating of trusts, but the sole purpose of the amendment is made to the act of 1887 and as amended in 1906 and 1910, and has reference solely to transportation and not to violations of the antitrust law. So that, upon its very face, it indicates that it is subject to a point of order, because it proposes to deal and does deal with an entirely different subject foreign to the one dealt with in this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Oklahoma should introduce a bill embodying the subject matter of his amendment, then there is no question but the subject matter would direct that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce rather than the Committee on the Judiciary. There is no question in my mind but this amendment covers the subject matter over which the committee reporting this bill now under consideration has no jurisdiction. The subject matter of the amendment is so important and so different from the subject matters that are referred to the Committee on the Judiciary that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has sole jurisdiction, so that in my opinion the point of order is well taken.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to consume too much of the time of the committee, but I want to call the attention of the Chair and the committee just for a moment to this proposition. The Congress of the United States has begun on a trust program made up of three bills, the first of which is the trade-commission bill, which they said has nothing to do with pipe lines, common carriers, Standard Oil rates, and the water-power trust. That bill has been laid aside with a favorable recommendation. We are now considering a bill from the Committee on the Judiciary, dealing with all sorts of monopoly in every conceivable form and fashion and every conceivable way, and I want to ask the Chairman and the House if it is going to be the ruling of the Chair and if it is going to be the decision of the committee that a complete trust program shall be put through, ought we not to put through a measure dealing with the Standard Oil Trust or the water-power trust? We do not want to shoot wide of the mark; they are notorious monopolies in this country, and these are propositions with which we ought to deal. It is not enough to push them aside when we are dealing with trust legislation.

The section 3 that we amended Friday by including oil, gas, water power, and so forth, certainly is dealing with the subject, and, if for no other reason, that ought to render additional legislation on the same subject in order.

Again, this bill is wide in its scope. It deals with labor legislation in the first part of paragraph 7. It deals with stocks, bonds, and banking legislation in other sections. Why is it we can not deal with the most monumental of all trusts?

It is not sufficient for the House to say, it is not sufficient for the Chairman to say, every time a question is raised on a bill dealing with monopoly, that it is out of order, or it is germane, or not germane, when the identical section dealing with that particular proposition relates to carriers. It is remarkable in the extreme that the Committee on the Judiciary should in an amendment say they have the power to exempt carriers from certain obligatory duties, and in the next breath should say they have no right, and that it would be not germane to put upon a bill a provision putting duties upon them.

I do not know what the decision of the Chair may be, and I do not know what the disposition of the committee may be, but surely this House is in favor of declaring the pipe-lines and water-power trusts carriers to be common carriers and subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I can not fathom a proposition of running away from a question so important, so necessary, and so patent and so universally agreed to by everybody.

For years the Interstate Commerce Commission themselves upon their own motion have been trying to bring pipe lines under the jurisdiction of that commission. What happens? In comes the Standard Oil Co. and brings an injunction proceeding and enjoins them from coming under the protection of that law.

This is the first time, and it is the only time during this administration and this Congress, under the resolution adopted by the Democratic caucus, when we have any chance to get relief on this proposition. I believe a bill on trusts and monopolies might properly go to any extent and all its provisions would still be germane as parts of a bill that proposes to curb monopolies. What are the pipe lines? The worst monopoly in the country. What is the Standard Oil Co.? The worst monopoly in the country. What is the Water Power Trust? One of the worst monopolies in the country. Is there any reason why, in dealing with monopoly, we should not deal with the transportation question, which is the vital cord in the whole trust question.

It has been said, and well said, that he who controls the transportation controls the country, and it is very true. The men who control the pipe lines control the production of oil and the price of oil, both in the region of production and at the consumer's end; and even so with the power trust. I believe that a bill so comprehensive as to carry out the legislative antitrust program for an entire administration and for an entire Congress should include this transportation question. The Chair may be ready to hold that this section shall be considered at this time, or——

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. CULLOP. Is not the purpose of this amendment to control the transportation of these products now, or regulate them where they are not controlled or regulated under the interstate-commerce law?

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely; and not alone that, Mr. Chairman, but the oil-transportation companies are all in the oil-production business themselves. The only market for crude oil that the independent producer has is the pipe-line company, which is a transporter, which transports it or refuses to transport it, as it elects to do. It then has it in its full control and sells it at what it will at its destination point.

Mr. CULLOP. Is not the further purpose of this amendment also to control a situation which now, because of the peculiar conditions of operating the pipe lines, can not be controlled by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. FERRIS. Absolutely; and the Commerce Court, under the Hepburn amendment, sought to do this very thing that I am trying to do; only I drew the amendment here a little more comprehensively, so as to be sure and include it. Then came along the Prairie Oil and Gas case, which I have before me, and knocked out this proposition of holding pipe lines as carriers. Judge Mack dissented in an able opinion, and the matter is now pending in the Supreme Court. This amendment does what the court indicated a former Congress could have done when we enacted that law. We can do it now. We ought to do it now. There is no use to postpone it. The American people deserve it. The trust question is being dealt with; we ought to do it now.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, as I read this amendment, it is not an attempt to amend the interstate-commerce law at all, but it is to put into this law a remedy for a condition which the Interstate Commerce Commission can not control for the want of legislation. There is no law upon that subject, and the language of the amendment very clearly shows that it does not attempt to amend the interstate-commerce law. It is an amendment to this bill on a matter that is not now regulated or under the supervision in any way of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I want to call the attention of the Chair to the language:

> That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any corporation or any person or persons to transport the products of any mine or mines, including coal, oil, gas, or hydroelectric energy, either by rail, water, pipe line, transmission line, or otherwise, from one State, Territory, or district of the United States to any other State, Territory, or district of the United States, or any foreign country—

Now, listen to the language—

> who shall not become a common carrier within the meaning and purpose of and subject to an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887.

Now, by the very language of the amendment it clearly shows that the subject matter embraced in this amendment is not a subject under any provision of the interstate-commerce law, but it is a matter entirely outside of it and a matter that it can not handle, and for that reason it has a proper place here, and it is proposed to place it under the supervision of the different sections of this bill.

Section 3 was amended so as to include oil and gas and water-power production, so as to make the language of that section clearly cover those articles of commerce. Now, as those articles of gas and oil are transported in some of the States, and especially in the State of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], it does not come under the provisions or regulations of the interstate-commerce law; but the pipe lines are so regulated and conducted that the commission can not obtain jurisdiction of the subject matter at all because of the manner in which the oil is transported. The very language of this section shows that it is not an amendment to the interstate-commerce law, but clearly belongs to and is a part of the subject matter to be regulated in the legislation now proposed to be adopted by this measure.

If the Chair will turn to section 3 he will observe that that section was amended by the adoption of an amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma so as to cover these two articles of commerce. It was then contended that as this bill was drawn it did not cover the subject of oil and gas and hydroelectric energy, and the bill was so amended. And it is now contended that the transportation of both oil and gas in some sections of the United States is so manipulated and controlled that they avoid coming under the Interstate Commerce Commission, or the act to regulate commerce passed in 1887 or any amendment thereto.

If that be true—and I assume no one here will attempt to deny that condition in relation to this matter—then where does it belong if it does not belong in this bill, and when is the time to adopt the amendment or some provision to regulate that important matter, if not now in the handling of this trust legislation?

These two things—oil and hydroelectric energy—constitute two of the greatest articles of commerce, and are absolutely controlled to-day by the trusts of this country; and while we are adopting this antitrust legislation bearing directly on this subject and kindred subjects, is not this the time when something controlling these articles of commerce should be incorporated into this measure? I call the attention of the Chair to the language of the amendment, showing that it is not an amendment to the interstate-commerce law of 1887, because it distinctly provides that it is not any part of that law, but these are articles entirely outside of the purview of that legislation and all of the amendments that have been made of it. I submit that it is in order here, and I hope we will incorporate in this measure provisions which will control these twin giants of monopoly and which have been remorseless in their exploitation of the people of the entire country. We should see to it that these two great combinations are not permitted to escape all legislation which will make them amenable to strict regulation.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit the Chair to ask him a question?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] were to offer a bill containing in effect the provisions offered by him in this amendment, to what committee of this House would it go? In other words, what committee would have jurisdiction of it? Would it be the Committee on the Judiciary or the committee to which the gentleman belongs, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. CULLOP. I shall be glad to answer the Chair as I understand that matter. While I do not think that question is important here, or I do not think it could have any bearing in the consideration of this legislation, I do say that the jurisdiction of the subject matter of this bill was properly in the Interstate Commerce Committee and not the Judiciary Committee, and I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] upon that subject. Nearly every question dealt with in this legislation is a proper subject for the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and does not belong to the Judiciary Committee at all. But I submit the test in deciding this question is not to what committee a bill embracing this question should be referred, but does the amendment contain subject matter directly connected with the objects covered by this proposed legislation? Measured by that test it is clearly germane here and in order.

If that question had been raised at the inception of this legislation, the Speaker of this House doubtless would have referred the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce instead of the Judiciary Committee, because the subjects embraced in it are proper subjects of legislation for the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and not the Judiciary Committee. But the question the Chair is now asking, I take it, is not the proper test and does not settle this question. The subject matter covered by this amendment is germane to the legislation here proposed and to the legislation that has been adopted all along in the sections of the bill we are now considering.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I will.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, my only thought was to supplement what the gentleman is saying by calling attention to the fact that on the second paragraph of section 7 that we have just disposed of and on which a long debate ensued the gentleman from Illinois debated what occurred two years ago. The bill from beginning to end is made up of matters that belong partly to this committee and to other committees, if caught at the inception, but they have gone to the committee, have received consideration, been reported here, and this House has jurisdiction of it, and we ought to go along with it.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, one thought further and I am through. Let me call the attention of the Chair to this proposition: That whenever any subject has been referred for regulation or supervision in any provision in this bill it has been referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission and not to the courts of this country. Running through every provision from the first word in it to the close of the provision the jurisdiction and settlement of questions in a primary sense are committed to the Interstate Commerce Commission and not to the courts in this country. The last amendment adopted here was a matter that did not put the regulation of it under any court in this country, but it put it under the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission. If that view of it be true, then this subject is germane here. If the standard of what committee it would be referred to is to be taken as a measure of the jurisdiction of this question, the last amendment was not germane, and a number of amendments that have been adopted during the course of the consideration of this bill are not germane, because the question was referred for arbitrament to the Interstate Commerce Commission and not to the courts of the land.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, may I call attention of the Chair to a few points? In section 9, which provides—

> That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person who is engaged as an individual, or who is a member of a partnership, or is a director or other officer of a corporation that is engaged in the business, in whole or in part, of producing or selling equipment, materials, or supplies to, or in the construction or maintenance of, railroads or other common carriers engaged in commerce, shall act as a director or other officer or employee of any other corporation or common carrier engaged in commerce—

And so forth.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the committee had jurisdiction to control who shall be the directors of common carriers, why would not an amendment such as the gentleman from Oklahoma offers be germane? If it is appropriate to say who shall be directors of a common carrier in this bill, then it is appropriate to legislate on any subject that applies to common carriers; and if this amendment goes out on a point of order, will not we be compelled to take out of this bill section 9?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the Chair's question to the gentleman from Indiana as to whether, if this amendment was introduced as an original bill it would go to the Interstate Commerce Committee, I submit to the Chair that that can not decide the germaneness of the amendment, for the reason that the sole standard is whether or not there is anything in this bill as it now appears before the committee to which this amendment is germane. If there is, it must be admitted, although in the first instance it might have gone to the Interstate Commerce Committee. If the Chair will recall, a little later on in the bill the subject of directors of banks is dealt with. If that had been introduced as an original bill it would have gone not to the Judiciary Committee but to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Now, with reference to the germaneness of this amendment, I wish to submit an observation that has not been mentioned to the Chair, and that is that this is clearly germane under section 3 of the bill. In other words, section 3 of the bill has dealt with this very subject, and having done so this proposed amendment becomes germane. Section 3 deals, as amended, with interstate commerce in the product of the mine. It is provided that the owner or person controlling the product, or the transporter engaged in selling, is prohibited from arbitrarily refusing to sell that product.

Let me read to the Chair the amendment as it now stands:

> That is shall be unlawful for any corporation or any person or persons to transport the products of any mine or mines, including coal, oil, gas—

And so forth.

Now, then, we have dealt with the transporter of these very products in section 3, and this proposed amendment only does one thing. The section as it stands relates to arbitrarily refusing to sell, and all this does is to provide that they shall not engage in that transportation unless they shall become a common carrier. It has nothing whatever to do with any amendment of the interstate-commerce law in the slightest degree. It simply places a condition precedent on the transportation of this product of the mine which this committee has dealt with in section 3.

It seems to me clear that if this amendment had been proposed to section 3 after the adoption of the gentleman's amendment no one would have thought of raising the point of order upon it, and if that be true, it is certainly in order to offer it as a separate section.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Supplementary to what the gentleman has said, on page 24, the first paragraph of section 7 deals with labor conditions, and if the Chair is going to say as a test that the committee had no jurisdiction, that portion should have been referred to the Committee on Labor.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair did not mean to intimate that that would be the test. The gentleman from Indiana simply suggested it to the Chair, and that is the reason the Chair propounded the interrogatory.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, just a word or two. We are dealing here not with the creation of interstate common carriers, but with the acts of interstate carriers already established and the acts of individuals. We are dealing with combinations, contracts in restraint of trade, and immoral business practices. We are not undertaking to create common carriers, and that is all there is to my friend's amendment. He wants the committee considering an antitrust bill to force certain corporations to become common carriers, because they transport their own product from one State to another. It is not necessary to discuss that phase of it, but I doubt very much whether Congress can say that because a man transports his corn from one State to another on his own shoulders or in his own wagon that he can be compelled to be a common carrier. This very identical question is now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States. It comes from the Interstate Commerce Commission on an appeal, showing it is an interstate-commerce question, and I submit that this House in preparing an antitrust bill should not be put in the attitude of creating common carriers, and that therefore the amendment is not germane to this section or to the bill.

[Mr. DECKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has offered an amendment as a new section which relates to the transportation of the products of any mine and provides that it shall be unlawful for any corporation to transport such product unless it becomes a common carrier within the intent and purpose of the special act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887. In ruling upon the point of order it is not the province of the Chair to pass upon the desirability of such legislation or the importance of the particular amendment. If the Chair were to express his personal opinion he might be in sympathy with a good deal of what the gentleman from Oklahoma has said. But the Chair must pass upon the point of order under the rules and procedure governing such matters. This amendment does not on its face refer to any monopoly or restraint of trade or seek to prevent a monopoly in restraint of trade. The bill under consideration is a bill to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies. Reference has been made to the second paragraph of section 7, but as the Chair construes that paragraph it is simply intended to relieve certain officers of common carriers from the operation of the Sherman antitrust law under certain conditions set forth in the paragraph. The Chair is unable to understand how the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma can be germane to a bill framed for the purpose of supplementing existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies. The Chair does not say it will not be in order at some future time in the consideration of this bill, but it certainly seems to the Chair, so far as this particular portion of the bill is concerned, that it is not germane, and for that reason the Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair would like to state, in addition, reference having been made by the gentleman from Wisconsin to section 3 and the amendment adopted by the committee a day or so ago, as a reason why this amendment is germane, that if the gentleman will read that amendment he will see that it simply provides that those in control, either as owners or transporters of the products of any mine, etc., shall not have the right to withhold such products from any responsible purchaser or, in other words, to use them for the purpose of crushing out competition. Quite a different proposition from that which is presented in the amendment now proposed. The Chair thinks that the amendment is not in order to this particular paragraph or section of the bill and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers a new section, which the Clerk will report.

"That in any city, town, or county of the United States wherein a cooperative association is established for the purpose of producing or marketing a food product or products any person who shall directly or indirectly for the purpose of destroying competition, discriminate in price in the purchase of such food products or the materials thereof within such city, town, or county, or use other means the effect of which is to destroy competition or secure a monopoly in commerce, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this attempts to reach, and I think reaches, a very great evil which exists to such an extent that many of the States of the Union have already legislated to overcome it. Wherever a cooperative association is formed among the producers of food products large dealers in the same line of business at once try to drive the cooperative association out of business, and for that purpose will send into that territory their agents to purchase the products from the producers and endeavor by paying higher prices to drive out the cooperative association. The payment of higher prices for a time is for the purpose of destroying the competition of the cooperative association, put it out of business, and thus control the prices themselves. There is no law now in existence that exactly meets that condition with regard to interstate trade. For instance, to give a concrete example of the way this matter works, a cooperative creamery is established in some small town. If control is sought of the market by some large company or great combination of that character in an adjoining State they will send their agents to the town where the cooperative association is located and establish a receiving station—centralizers, as they are called.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. WEBB. I thought that section 2 absolutely destroyed that practice.

Mr. TOWNER. I can not agree with the gentleman in regard to that. I can not even take the time to argue it. If that is the opinion of the committee, of course they will then be opposed to this amendment. But I think this amendment will make it so certain that there will be no question about it.

It is a very great evil. It injuriously affects more producers in this country than any other one thing to-day. In the State of Iowa there are many cooperative creameries established, and they are being put out of business by these "centralizers" from other States, who go into their markets and buy the products from the farmers at a higher price for a certain time, but whose sole object is to destroy the established creamery and control the market in their own interest.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I did not catch the full purport of the gentleman's amendment. Can the gentleman briefly state it?

Mr. TOWNER. I can not state the purport more succinctly than to state its terms. My amendment reads:

That in any city, town, or county in the United States wherein a cooperative association is established for the purpose of producing or marketing a food product or products, any person who shall directly or indirectly for the purpose of destroying competition discriminate in price in the purchase of such food products or the materials thereof within such city, town, or county, or use other means the effect of which is to destroy competition or secure a monopoly in commerce, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor—

And so forth.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this suggestion to the gentleman: We have absolutely no authority to pass that sort of an amendment. The gentleman is asking Congress to go into a city or a little town or village and regulate the affairs of business there. That does not relate to interstate commerce at all.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. This amendment would be effective only with regard to those engaged in commerce, and your bill says "commerce" is interstate commerce. The gentleman should not think that I do not know this bill operates only in interstate commerce. That is the great difficulty now. Very many States have legislated and do control this matter in the States, but that is not the most serious trouble. The serious trouble comes from those large combinations outside of the States and which the States can not control. This bill is limited in its terms and applies only to operations in interstate commerce.

Mr. GARNER. But the gentleman's amendment does not say anything about interstate commerce.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. It does. It says "commerce," which you define by this bill to be interstate commerce. It is limited strictly to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, allow me to make a further statement in regard to this amendment. Certainly it meets a real evil, and if gentlemen desire to make this bill of benefit to the people of the United States they ought not to object to this amendment to it.

The products of the Iowa creameries last year sold in the Chicago market at the average price of 33 cents a pound, and yet the average price received by the farmers for their butter fat was only 25 cents a pound. The "centralizers," those controlling their market, made 36 per cent on the butter and had a margin of 20 per cent in addition on the overrun, for a pound of butter fat will produce 1.20 pounds of butter. Two of the cooperative concerns paid the farmers 34¼ cents a pound, or more than the Chicago prices.

Now, if you allow the destruction of these cooperative associations, not only of creamery and dairy products, but all other associations of that character—voluntary associations of the farmers who put directly their product on the market—if you destroy them and drive them out of business, you put into the hands of these "centralizers," who control the markets, the power to destroy competition and enable them to pay the farmers just what they choose for their product.

Mr. METZ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. METZ. In New York City we have no dairies and no cows, and we have got to get milk from outside. Now, suppose that across the line in New Jersey there is a town which has a cooperative concern like the one the gentleman speaks of. The milk dealer in New York City is shy in milk and must get a supply. He goes to New Jersey and buys milk from the farmers at a higher price than the cooperative concern is paying, for the purpose of getting milk to take it to New York. Would that be permissible under your amendment, or must the city of New York go without milk?

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that this bill could not apply in any case unless the object and purpose was to destroy competition or establish a monopoly or drive out a producer.

Mr. METZ. The purpose is to get the milk, and if they take it away that town has got no milk.

Mr. TOWNER. This amendment is limited strictly to cooperative associations. It meets directly a real need; it meets directly an evil that is growing throughout the United States and needs immediate relief.

Mr. METZ. You prohibit anybody buying from the dealer or producer at a higher price the thing which is purchased by the cooperative concern.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that there can be nothing that will so bring down the price of food products to the ultimate consumer like the destruction of these combinations that control them. The middlemen are the people who raise the prices. Butter is sold in the Chicago market at an average price of 33.92 cents for a whole year, and yet the farmers receive less than 25 cents for their product. The farmers will receive a higher price and the consumers will pay a lower price if you will encourage cooperation in the production of food products. I sincerely hope this amendment may be adopted.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if there is any necessity for section 2, there is also special necessity for the converse, which is found in the amendment of my colleague. Section 2 provides that any person who shall discriminate in price with intent to injure a competitor between different purchasers of commodities shall be subject to the penalties of the act. This amendment provides, in effect, that anyone who shall discriminate between sellers—that is, persons who are bringing various products to him to be sold—shall also be subject to the penalty where the object and purpose is to destroy competition or to obtain a monopoly. As my colleague has suggested, it strikes at an evil that has been maintained and been growing for a long time in the section of country which we represent. A very large creamery is maintained in the neighboring State of Nebraska, and that creamery makes a practice of overbidding and outbidding any concern that may start up in competition with it in the neighboring State. The only way this evil can be reached is by some such provision. I am very much inclined to think it ought to have been included in section 2.

I know it is said that these acts are already reached and covered by the Sherman Act. It is true they are, if there is any restraint of trade or if monopoly is intended to be acquired, as I think; but the gentlemen upon the other side have all along been contending that similar acts were not covered and not reached by the Sherman Act. If so, then this provision which has been introduced by my colleague [Mr. TOWNER] is absolutely necessary in order to reach actions of this character.

Mr. FITZHENRY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose this amendment. It seems to me it should be defeated, if for no other reason than the manner in which it is drawn. It provides that in any city, town, or county in the United States where a cooperative association is established for the purpose of producing or marketing a product any person who shall, directly or indirectly, for the purpose of destroying competition, discriminate in price in the purchase of such food products or other material within such city, town, or county shall be subject to the penalties provided. It provides, first, for the location of the cooperative institution in a certain city, town, or county, and limits its operation to the city, town, or county, and clearly covers intrastate and not interstate commerce. It is true that in the following phrase these words are used:

> Or use other means the effect of which is to destroy competition or to secure a monopoly in commerce.

That is such a vague provision that it ought not to be written into the law at this place.

Any merit that there might be in this proposition is all covered by the Sherman antitrust law, and the adoption of this amendment at this time will simply limit the remedies of the people against the institution which it is aimed against.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZHENRY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is the gentleman aware that you have much the same provision in section 2 with reference to the discrimination in price of commodities, which uses similar language? It refers to "purchasers of commodities in the same section."

Mr. FITZHENRY. Section 2 is to promote competition and not to limit it as is the idea here, and then section 2 is aimed against monopoly, a concern being engaged in interstate commerce coming into a particular locality and lowering the price, destroying the competitor, and then raising the price again. It covers a train of events.

Mr. WEBB. If the evil practices detailed by the gentleman from Iowa are interstate in their operation and effect, he defines very clearly a case which would come within the provisions of section 2 of the Sherman antitrust law, which is plain and specific, and which would break up the practice which he inveighs against and which ought to be broken up. It reads:

> Every person who shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize or combine or conspire with any other person to monopolize any part of trade among the several States—

And so forth.

The acts which he complains of are covered by the Sherman antitrust law if they are interstate. If they are intrastate, he can not complain to Congress, because we have no power to remedy it. He must go to the State legislature and get them broken up by an act of that body, as we have done in North Carolina. Two or three months ago this same practice was tried on the people of the city of Wilmington, N. C., and the grand jury indicted them under the antitrust laws of our State and put them out of business and broke it up—the practice—by imposing fines on the parties to the practice.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman say that the acts attempted to be reached by section 2 are not done in restraint of trade?

Mr. WEBB. There it is the individual act, and the discriminating act itself is condemned.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is what this is.

Mr. WEBB. Here you have a perfect monopoly described by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] describing every detail, which makes it a monopoly or an attempt to monopolize, and comes within section 2 of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It comes in the same way under the provision you have in section 2.

Mr. WEBB. This is not the place to offer the amendment. It would mutilate section 7 and has nothing to do with the preceding parts of the same section. The law is ample to cover the condition described, and I trust the House will not adopt the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 8. That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to create a monopoly of any line of trade in any section or community.

No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them, whose stock or other share capital is so acquired, or to create a monopoly of any line of trade in any section or community.

This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition. Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not to eliminate or substantially lessen competition.

Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall make stockholding relations between corporations legal when such relations constitute violations of the antitrust laws.

Nor shall anything herein contained be construed to prohibit any railroad corporation from aiding in the construction of branch or short-line railroads, so located as to become feeders to the main line of the company so aiding in such construction, or from acquiring or owning all or any part of the stock of such branch line, nor to prevent any railroad corporation from acquiring and owning all or any part of the stock of a branch or short-line railroad constructed by an independent company where there is no substantial competition between the company owning the branch line so constructed and the company owning the main line acquiring the property, or an interest therein, nor to prevent any railroad company from extending any of its lines, through the medium of the acquisition of stock or otherwise of any other railroad company, where there is no substantial competition between the company extending its lines and the company whose stock, property, or an interest therein, is so acquired.

A violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 8 and substitute the following:

"SEC. 8. (a) That it shall be unlawful to own, hold, or otherwise use any share of any capital stock of any corporation so as to aid in carrying into effect, creating, or maintaining any contract combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of commerce or to own, hold, or otherwise use any such share so as to aid in effecting or attempting to effect a monopoly or any combination or conspiracy to monopolize any part of commerce. In addition to any punishments prescribed by existing law, it is provided that as a penalty for a violation of this provision all earnings that may accrue upon any share of capital stock while so unlawfully owned, held, or used shall be forfeited and belong to the stockholders of the corporations having issued the same whose shares are not then unlawfully owned, held, or used. And none of the shares of such stock while so unlawfully owned, held, or used shall entitle anyone to vote or otherwise participate in the election of any director, trustee, officer, or employee of the corporation having issued such share or to otherwise participate in the management or control thereof.

"(b) No corporation shall issue any share of capital stock or borrow any money to acquire any part of the capital stock of any corporation engaged in commerce, and the acquisition of any such stock by any such means is prohibited. Nor shall any share of capital stock of any corporation engaged in commerce be acquired by or on behalf of any other corporation by exchanging therefore directly or indirectly any share of the capital stock of another corporation. As a penalty it is provided that all earnings that may accrue upon any share of stock hereafter acquired in violation of this paragraph shall, while retained directly or indirectly by the corporation acquiring the same, be forfeited and belong to the other shareholders of the corporation having issued the same. And none of the shares of stock acquired in violation of this paragraph shall, while so retained, entitle anyone to vote for any director, trustee, officer, or employee of the corporation having so issued such stock, or to otherwise participate in the management or control thereof. This paragraph shall not prevent any bank, banking association, or trust company engaged as a business in receiving deposits from using such deposits to acquire, either by purchase or as security, any share of capital stock of a corporation engaged in commerce.

"(c) Unless otherwise authorized by the Commissioner of Corporations, no stock or any bond or obligation due more than two years from the date of issue shall be issued by any corporation engaged in commerce for less than par or until the fair market value thereof shall have been paid in cash into the treasury of the corporation. Said commissioner may, however, on application, permit any issue for less than par and for property in place of cash if it shall appear to him that it is reasonably necessary and that a fair consideration is actually received for such issue. Stocks, bonds, and obligations issued in violation of this paragraph shall be void.

"(d) That no corporation engaged in commerce shall declare any dividend except from the net profits arising from its business; nor shall it divide, withdraw, or in any way pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock of such corporation, or any of the proceeds of the issue or sale of any such stock, unless it shall first be made to appear to the Commissioner of Corporations that it is reasonably necessary for the purpose of maintaining the credit of the corporation or to carry on its legitimate business. Any person who shall violate or participate in violating any provision of this paragraph or suffer or permit any violation thereof shall be individually liable for all the debts of the corporation and all shares of stock issued in violation of this paragraph shall be void.

"(e) That paragraphs (c) and (d) of this section shall not apply to any corporation whose capital stock, including bonds due more than one year from their date of issue, shall be less than $2,000,000 par value, unless the Commissioner of Corporations shall find and certify as to any corporation that it is a part of some combination that is so conducted as to make it substantially a business unit with more than $2,000,000 in capital including such bonds; or unless said commissioner shall find and certify as to any corporation that it controls more than one-half of all commerce in its line of commerce in any section that includes two or more States. Upon making such certificate, a copy thereof shall be delivered to the corporation affected, and from the date of such delivery this section shall apply to such corporation, and no part of this section shall apply to any corporation subject to regulation as a common carrier under the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and amendments thereto. Nor shall this section be construed to repeal any provision of the antitrust laws."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I assume that it is useless at this time to try to make this law any stronger by offering any amendments. We have to-day exempted labor organizations from the Sherman Antitrust Act; we have also exempted railway companies so as to permit them to stifle competition, and now section 8 is submitted to authorize the formation of trusts. I called attention to this section some days ago. I have listened patiently for any explanation of this section that would show that my criticism is not justified, but so far I have heard no such explanation.

I again call attention to the third paragraph of this section 8, and again repeat that it clearly permits corporations to consolidate into trusts. Clearly permits the creation of a community of interests that will eliminate anything like competition. I am not going to explain this feature any further than I did a day or two ago. Anyone who will read it carefully will come to the same conclusion that I have come to. I want to explain briefly the nature of my amendment. The first paragraph of the amendment attempts to compel corporations to unscramble their own eggs. It attempts to make it unprofitable for corporations or individuals to hold stock in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and as such to induce them voluntarily to separate and organize along legal lines. If we depend on the courts to set aside these combinations, we know from past experience that it is ineffectual.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield for a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. I could not get the purport of the gentleman's amendment. Does his amendment, like the section, deal solely with holding companies?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It deals with all combinations through stock ownership.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand this section 8 deals with holding companies only.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; it deals with all combinations through stock ownership. Paragraph 3 of the section deals solely with holding companies, but paragraphs 1 and 2 deal generally with stock consolidation of corporations, whether holding companies or not. Paragraph 2 of the amendment which I have offered was suggested in the hearings on this bill. Almost the only method adopted by corporations in forming these consolidations is by the issue of their own stock in exchange for the stock of the corporation that they seek to acquire. Corporations do not invest surplus money which they may have in the corporate stock of another corporation. On the other hand, they create an additional amount of stock and take that stock and use it for the purpose of trading for the stock of the corporation they seek to acquire. I have drawn the second paragraph so as to prohibit that practice. If that practice was prohibited, I do not believe we should have very much trouble about the formation in the future of other consolidations of corporations by reason of stock ownership. The third and fourth paragraphs of my amendment present nothing particularly new; like provisions can be found in almost any statute that seeks to regulate corporations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have sought not to apply paragraphs 3 or 4 to the small corporations that only incidentally do an interstate business. I have limited those two provisions to corporations with a capital stock of $2,000,000, but in defining capital stock I include the bonds. You can find provisions like those two in the Massachusetts statute or in the New Jersey statute. It seems to me that when these corporations go into interstate commerce we have a right to say to them, "You must comply with provisions of this class, provisions that are recognized generally as reasonable." I simply submitted them as such. I realize it is useless for me to attempt to convince this committee, but I want to impress upon it that it is not safe to go before this country with a provision such as you have in section 8. Here is a provision that clearly wipes out for all practical purposes the Sherman Antitrust Act so far as it prohibits combinations in restraint of trade. The Democrats and the Republicans stand pledged to the maintenance of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Do you believe that you can deceive the people into the belief that you are passing an effective statute? In some way this statute may soon reach the courts. When it does the court will give it the construction that its plain language clearly warrants, and when they do you will have a reckoning. No doubt you expect this bill to be rewritten in the Senate. I do not believe you expect this bill to become a law or you would try to correct it in this House. It certainly does not add to the standing or dignity of the House by passing such a political makeshift as this.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I regret the action taken by the Banking and Currency Committee when it met the other day and agreed not to consider rural-credits legislation immediately, but to postpone action until the antitrust program is out of the House. This means that there will be no legislation on the subject of rural credits at this session of Congress. Mr. Chairman, I conducted a filibuster in this House on the 14th of last month, in the interest of legislation for the farmers and laborers of this country, which is more important, in my opinion, to the American people than the tariff, a commercial system of banking, or the antitrust acts. We were assured by the leaders of this House, if the Banking and Currency Committee would report a bill, it would be considered at this session. I desire to call attention that nearly a month has passed, and the Banking and Currency Committee has not held a meeting to consider the question. I am informed that some, if not all, of the Democratic members of that committee met informally the other day and, by a majority vote, decided not to consider this question until after the antitrust bills had been disposed of in the House. No one is so simple as not to be able to understand what this means. We all know that this legislation has been put in cold storage and will be strangled, so far as this session of Congress is concerned. Had the Banking and Currency Committee met immediately after the 14th of May and begun the consideration of this question, on the report of the subcommittee, which had been holding sessions since last November, it might possibly, with the assistance of H. Parker Willis, of the Wall Street Journal of Commerce, who prepared the banking and currency bill we passed last year, and who received $3,500 for that work, have reported to Congress, before the antitrust program is out of the way, a bill on this subject. This Congress, if this had been done, could have passed a bill on this subject at this session.

Mr. Chairman, if this legislation is not passed at this session of Congress the people will know where to place the blame. It will rest on the Banking and Currency Committee. The action of that committee in postponing the consideration of this subject until the antitrust program is completed means that it will take a month after that date before a bill can be reported. That will be some time in July, and insures death to this legislation at this session. Mr. Chairman, the widespread demand for this legislation among the American farmers has been demonstrated to me by letters from all parts of the country. I have just received a letter inclosing one addressed to Mr. Bryan. It is so simply worded, so earnest in purpose, and so appealing in tone that I desire to read it into my remarks to impress upon the Congress that a great mistake is being made by postponing action which means so much to the American farmer. He has suffered long and patiently; he has seen the earnings of his family taken to build battleships, to construct the Panama Canal, to dig out rivers and harbors, to build cities and foster and encourage manufacturing industries, to wage costly wars that people of islands beyond the seas might be free—all this he has seen and borne without complaint; but I warn you if this piece of legislation so vital to the welfare of himself and family is put to death in the House of Representatives he will demand an accounting; he will visit his wrath on the heads of those who prove faithless in this hour which is fraught with so much promise to him. Mr. Chairman, the letters I refer to read:

ABERDEEN, S. DAK., May 28, 1914.

Hon. J. B. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I inclose a letter which I had intended to send direct to Mr. Bryan, but upon reading your remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 22 I concluded to inclose it with one to you upon the matter of the rural credits bill, for which you have been so nobly contending. The farmers of the great Northwest will be in a sad plight this fall if they are not able to borrow money to protect the abundant crop which at this time bids fair to excel any other year. As a consequence of several bad years, these crops will have to go on the market at thrashing time, and that means a price below the cost of production. The farmers of the Northwest are living in hopes that this bill may become a law and in effect before the crop is disposed of.

God bless you and give you success in your efforts.

Very respectfully, yours,

C. H. CREED, Sr.

And the letter addressed to Mr. Bryan reads as follows:

ABERDEEN, S. DAK., May 28, 1914.

Hon. W. J. BRYAN,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: By way of introduction I will say that I am the founder of the Dacoma Industrial Chautauqua, near Aberdeen, which platform you have graced several times, which doubtless you remember distinctly, although you may have forgotten the manager. I wish to send greetings in behalf of the agricultural interests of this section for the great work you have done since entering upon the great office which you have so ably filled and for the efficient work in behalf of the interests of the farmers of the whole country. One thing more ought to be done before Congress adjourns, and that is the passage of a rural credits bill. The present outlook is good for an immense yield of small grain, and under the present system of commerce the great bulk of this crop will have to be marketed at a very low figure—below the actual cost of production—if the farmers can not borrow money at reasonable rates against their stock of grain and get a reasonable price, based upon the law of supply and demand. We are in hopes that President Wilson—God bless him—and you can see the great need of the enactment of this measure at the present session of Congress, and for this purpose we are writing this original request that you might be the means of giving us the relief which we so much desire.

God bless and give you abundant success in your work.

Most sincerely, yours,

C. H. CREED, Sr.

Mr. Chairman, if this legislation is not reported at an early date, I shall avail myself of all the power the rules of the House permit to force some action. I will not sit idly here and permit this legislation to be slaughtered in the House by its supposed friends. We were told the other day when I was making a fight for the consideration of this rural credits bill that the banking and currency bill passed last year extended credit of $369,000,000 to the farmers of this country. I congratulate myself that I was partly responsible for this credit extended to the farmer; but I desire to call attention in this connection to the fact that the regulations under which these loans may be made are as follows:

First. Real estate security must be farm land.

Second. It must be improved.

Third. There must be no prior lien.

Fourth. The property must be located in the same Federal reserve district as the bank making the loan.

Fifth. The amount of the loan must not exceed 50 per cent of the actual value of the property upon which it is secured.

These loans must not be for a period longer than five years, and the total of such loans by any bank must not exceed one-third of its time deposits and must not in any case exceed the capital and surplus of the bank. The time deposits in the district which I represent, according to the last report made to the Comptroller of the Treasury by the national banks, are:

Murray County, $22,350, and the amount loaned on real estate under this law could only be $7,450.

Garvin County, $129,293.19, and the amount of loans would be restricted to $43,097.73.

McClain County, $26,174.92, and the amount of loans would be restricted to $8,724.97.

Cleveland County, $2,246.12, and the loans would be restricted to $768.70.

Oklahoma County, $543,221.75, and the amount of loans would be restricted to $181,073.92

In Logan County there are no time certificates of deposit, and there would be no loans on farm lands.

In Payne County the time deposits are $80,589.34, and the amount of loans would be restricted to $26,263.10.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in conclusion that Mr. WINGO, of Arkansas, Mr. RAGSDALE, of South Carolina, and Mr. NEELEY of Kansas, all of whom have ever been steadfast friends of the farmer, I am informed, voted for the immediate consideration of this legislation. I hope we may build a fire on the backs of those who voted against the interests of the farmers and laborers of the country, which will cause them to wake up and legislate in the interest of this great industry, which comprises 40 per cent of the population of our country.

Mr. Chairman, I voted for the Thomas amendment this afternoon to the antitrust act, and I want to call attention to a report that is carried this afternoon in the Evening Star of an interview with the President which confirms me in the view that I took at that time when I voted for the Thomas amendment. I did not believe that the Webb amendment was broad enough to exempt labor and farmers' organizations from the terms of the antitrust act. The Star carries this report, in talking about the interview with the President:

He was asked numerous questions as to pending legislation, and especially as to the amendments to the Clayton bill touching upon the exemption of labor unions from the operation of the Sherman antitrust law. He does not believe that the amendments agreed upon by the administration and Congress give the exemptions mentioned.

That is in exact accordance with the view that I had when I voted for the Thomas amendment. The article continues:

On the contrary, he thinks there is no more immunity for labor and farm organizations, as far as violations of the law are concerned, than any corporation or other organization.

Mr. Chairman, I did not believe when I voted this afternoon that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] took care of labor and farmers' organizations, especially of farmers' organizations. I have not very many labor organizations in my own State, but we have a great many farmers' organizations, and I want to say this, that while that amendment might exempt the organization as such, it did not exempt the actions of the organization officials. Suppose the president of the farmers' union were to send down word to the organizations, or to the members of the union, to hold their cotton in the warehouse and not to sell it, to await a better price, is there any member of the Committee on the Judiciary who would say that that would not subject the member of the organization who sent down that word to prosecution under the Sherman antitrust law? If there is any Member, I would like for him to rise in his place and say so. The question was propounded here by Mr. GARNER this afternoon to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], who is a genuine friend of the farmer, and Mr. HENRY did not answer the question. It was also submitted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], and he candidly admitted that it would subject these members of the farmers' union, the grange, and so forth, to criminal prosecutions under the Sherman antitrust law. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: These gentlemen come before us and say this amendment offered by Mr. WEBB is supposed to take care of the farmers' and labor organizations. If this amendment takes care of them, why are not you willing to go further and put in it that they shall not be subject to prosecution; that these organizations shall not be subject to the terms of the antitrust act?

If we want to do the thing, if you want to exempt these organizations why not put language in the bill that absolutely and plainly takes care of them, and not put language in there that would be subject to judicial construction. Now, I do not know what experience you gentlemen have had with Federal judges. I know, Mr. Chairman, that out in our State we have not very much regard for the opinion of a Federal judge on any question. Why, they have tied up our 2-cent fare rate, they have enjoined our taxation, they have attempted, Mr. Chairman, to enjoin statehood in Oklahoma in the face of an act of Congress.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman referred to my colleague asking me a question, and said that I did not reply to it. I did make a reply to it, and I want to add here that even if this exemption were not written into the law which we have written in the shape of the Webb amendment that the farmers of Oklahoma or of Texas could meet and agree to hold their cotton or their grain, and put it in a warehouse, and hold it there until they got ready to sell, and that would not be a violation of the terms of the Sherman antitrust law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes longer.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman now is discussing matters that have been disposed of in the committee before, and we are trying to get along with this bill. We have 23 sections to dispose of, and we have just reached section 8, and, while the discussion is extremely interesting, if it is going to take very much longer——

Mr. HENRY. It is not going to take more than two minutes longer.

Mr. CARLIN. I have no objection to the gentleman having two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Oklahoma proceeding for two minutes?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. If I do not get some time, I will raise the point of no quorum if the gentleman wants to make objection.

Mr. CARLIN. That is the gentleman's privilege.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. And I will exercise my privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY. I say, without this exemption the farmers of Texas could have met and agreed to put their cotton in the warehouse and keep it there until they got ready to sell, and it would not be a violation of the Sherman antitrust law. Now, this exemption makes assurance doubly sure, and they are exempted from the provisions of the antitrust law, both in State and interstate commerce, if they see proper to invoke the protection of it.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman mean to say to this House that if the farmers of Oklahoma were to put their cotton in a warehouse and hold it for a certain price they would not be guilty under this act?

Mr. HENRY. Even if this law were not passed now they could not be touched under the terms of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Suppose the men who manufacture the cotton should put their manufactured goods in the warehouse to hold the manufactured goods for a certain price, would they be guilty under this act?

Mr. HENRY. If it entered into interstate commerce and becomes a part of interstate commerce, that is another proposition; but here is a purely local proposition, and it is not in violation of that statute. You can put every bale of cotton raised in Oklahoma or every bushel of corn or grain and hold it there until you get ready to sell, and that is not a violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say further this is exactly what was done in Kentucky with the tobacco raisers who pooled their tobacco——

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. And there was a fine imposed of $3,500——

Mr. BARKLEY. That is where they were charged with interfering with interstate tobacco by crossing the Ohio River.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I had five minutes, I thought.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had two minutes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I thought it was five.

Mr. CARLIN. I have no objection to the gentleman having three minutes more.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I want to extend my remarks by publishing in the RECORD a letter I have here on the subject of rural credits.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have a letter here on that subject, and a letter addressed to the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State, on that subject, and I want to put both of those letters in the RECORD. And I want to say at this time, Mr. Chairman, that unless we have rural credit legislation we have got to maintain a quorum pretty soon, and I shall make some points of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of certain letters. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, this provision, section No. 8 and the subsequent section of this bill, stretch the power of Congress over interstate commerce very far. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I have very serious doubts myself whether they do not go beyond the limit of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce by undertaking to regulate the internal management of corporations created by the States.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, on another occasion I saw fit to give expression to my views on this subject in a minority report which I signed, emanating from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House in 1910, and also to say what I thought about that subject on the floor during the discussion of that bill. I think there is more power in Congress and more reason for exercising it in regulating the matter of directors or the matter of transportation companies than it has to exercise it in this bill. I realize, Mr. Chairman, that the Democratic Party in its Baltimore convention adopted this in its platform:

We favor the declaration by law of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including, among others the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directors, of stock watering, of discrimination in price, and the control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions.

I am a pretty loyal Democrat, Mr. Chairman. I believe in following the declarations of party platforms, confiding in the wisdom of those who represent the party in the convention; and but for that declaration in the party platform I do not see how

I could bring myself to vote for the provisions of these sections 8 and 9, all of them. Nor, Mr. Chairman, have I yet brought myself to the conclusion that I can vote for them. I know, Mr. Chairman, it is not very fashionable to suggest that the Constitution stands in the way of legislation of any sort by Congress. But it would not be out of place, Mr. Chairman, to call attention of some—not many—of the adjudicated cases upon this subject, cases adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I maintain, and the Supreme Court has decided, that the charters of the corporations granted by the States are their guide as to what they shall do in the internal management of those corporations. I do not believe it is a proper exercise of legislative authority by Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution to say who shall or who shall not be directors of a corporation organized by a State. If we examine the law writers and the decisions of the courts that have passed upon those subjects we shall find that the regulation of the internal affairs of a corporation, what business it shall do, what the directors shall do, who they shall be, of whom the board of directors shall be composed, is an exercise of the police power of the States solely, and not a power authorized to be controlled by Congress.

Let us take the opposite view of it, Mr. Chairman, for a moment. Suppose Congress should undertake to say, in spite of State legislation, that there should be interlocking directorates; that there should be combinations of interstate railroads running from one State to another in spite of constitutional prohibitions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that Congress should declare that railroads that were engaged in interstate commerce might have interlocking directorates, and the States should forbid it. Is it to be presumed that Congress could authorize a thing of that sort? Yet, if Congress can forbid it, Congress can grant it.

Now, let us see what the Supreme Court of the United States says upon that subject.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is the gentleman speaking now of the provisions of section 9 instead of section 8?

Mr. BARTLETT. I said at the beginning that I was speaking of the provisions of sections 8 and 9. I am fully aware that the Supreme Court has decided in the Northern Securities case that holding companies, such as the Northern Securities Co., when they undertake to combine, and thereby interfere with commerce and have a monopoly, come within the purview of the act of 1890 by a divided court of 5 to 4. But I will read from the case of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Kentucky (161 U. S., 702).

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 10 minutes instead of 5. I want to put this in the RECORD.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object to my friend.

Mr. BARTLETT. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary when he left told me I might have additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. This was a case where the Louisville & Nashville Railroad undertook to combine with another railroad and to purchase some of its stock and own it in contravention of the constitution of Kentucky, which said it should not be done. When attacked in the courts for doing it they set up that the statute of Kentucky was unconstitutional because it interfered with interstate commerce, both railroad companies being interstate railroads. In that case the court said:

> It was said in Sherlock v. Alling (93 U. S., 99, 103, 104) and quoted with approbation in Plumley v. Massachusetts (155 U. S., 461) that "in conferring upon Congress the regulation of commerce it was never intended to cut the States off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country. Legislation, in a great variety of ways, may affect commerce and persons engaged in it without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the Constitution. * * * and it may be said, generally, that the legislation of a State not directed against commerce or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly and remotely affecting the operations of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction, whether on land or water, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate, or in any other pursuit."
> It has never been supposed that the dominant power of Congress over interstate commerce took from the States the power of legislation with respect to the instruments of such commerce so far as the legislation was within its ordinary police powers. Nearly all the railways in the country have been constructed under State authority, and it can not be supposed that they intended to abandon their power over them as soon as they were finished. The power to construct them involves necessarily the power to impose such regulation upon their operation as a sound regard for the interests of the public may seem to render desirable. In the division of authority with respect to interstate railways Congress reserves to itself the superior right to control their commerce and forbid interference therewith, while to the States remains the power to create and to regulate the instruments of such commerce so far as necessary to the conservation of the public interests.
> If it be assumed that the States have no right to forbid the consolidation of competing lines, because the whole subject is within the control of Congress, it would necessarily follow that Congress would have the power to authorize such consolidation in defiance of State legislation—a proposition which only needs to be stated to demonstrate its unsoundness. As we have already said, the power of one railway corporation to purchase the stock and franchises of another must be conferred by express language to that effect in the charter, and hence, if the charter of the Louisville & Nashville Co. had been silent upon that point it will be conceded that it would have no power to make the proposed purchase in this case. As the power to purchase, then, is derivable from the State, the State may accompany it with such limitations as it may choose to impose. Its results, then, from the argument of the appellant that, if there be any interference with interstate commerce it is in imposing limitations upon the exercise of a right which did not previously exist, and hence if the State permits such purchase or consolidation it is bound to extend the authority to every possible case or expose itself to the charge of interfering with commerce. This proposition is obviously untenable.

So that if the Congress has the right to exercise this power of prohibiting interlocking directorates in corporations simply because they engage in interstate commerce, then Congress has the power to permit interlocking directorates; and if the power is in Congress, the power is exclusive in Congress, and the whole power to regulate can be taken away from the States. In my opinion that can not be done.

I have another case here to which I desire to call the attention of the House, in volume 204, United States, page 152. That was a case where the State of New York levied a tax upon the transfer of shares of stock sold in New York. The tax was resisted upon the ground that the stock was sold to some one outside of the State, and that the tax was an interference with interstate commerce. The court held:

> The protection of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution is not available to defeat a State stamp-tax law on transactions wholly within a State, because they affect property without that State, or because one or both of the parties previously came from other States.

Those are two decisions which I have cited, and to which I desire to call the attention of the committee. If they are the law, if it be true that the State and only the State has the right to regulate who shall be directors and who shall not, and what a railroad or a corporation shall do in reference to purchasing or owning the property of its competitor, then the Congress has no power such as this bill undertakes to exercise. I do not think it has the power. I may be mistaken. I know that the steps have been long and the strides have been far in the direction of controlling everything under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

I recall a letter written by Mr. Jefferson to Judge Sloan in 1816, as I recall the year, when, criticizing and condemning the effort to concentrate all power in the Federal Government here at Washington, Mr. Jefferson said that under the commerce clause of the Constitution they would undertake not only to regulate what was real interstate commerce, but to bring under the control of Congress all manufacture and agriculture. If he could now revisit these scenes of his labors and see what has been done and what we are daily attempting to do he would see that the prophecy he made in 1816 had almost come to a dread realization.

So, Mr. Chairman, I find myself in this position of having very serious doubt as to the constitutionality of these sections and as to the power of Congress to enact them. I can not get away from that. It is no hobby. I have undertaken to study the question. I have given much thought to it on other occasions, as I have also upon this occasion, and I can not escape the conviction that Congress does not have the power, in regulating the instrumentalities of Congress, like railroads that pass from one State to another, to say how the internal affairs of such a corporation shall be managed.

To repeat what was said in the Kentucky case, would anyone presume for a moment that Congress would have the power to say that if the State law forbade it, that one competing railroad could absorb another, yet, in spite of said State law, should authorize such consolidation? Yet if Congress has the supreme and sole power and jurisdiction over the subject, it would have the right to permit it—as it does in this bill—permit traffic arrangements and permit railroad officers to confer together for the purpose of making agreements. If the State law forbids corporations within its domain from making these arrangements, Congress having the power to direct and saying that they can make these arrangements, and that one railroad could absorb another, you can not escape the conclusion and conviction that if Congress has the exclusive power to forbid these things it has the power to permit them.

So, Mr. Chairman, I come back to the proposition that these provisions of this bill give me serious concern and serious doubt as to what my duty in the matter is. I realize that I am liable to err as to how the law will be construed. When I read some recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States it looks, Mr. Chairman, as if they were ready to go even further than Congress wants them to go. The Supreme Court may decide this to be constitutional. As far as I am concerned I think they endanger the good provisions of the bill, and that in the platform, as it was written in Baltimore, the demands placed on the Democratic Members were made without considering whether they could be sustained in the courts or not. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, orders have been issued from the White House that the trust problem should be taken up at this session and some new law passed. These instructions have been issued in accordance with a theory, of which the President seems to be the chief exponent, that to cure any evil that exists it is only necessary to put a new law upon the statute books, and it matters little in what form the law is enacted. One part of this theory is that legislation upon any subject, no matter how complicated, can easily be drafted, and when once formulated should be accepted by Congress without any changes or amendments. At this particular time I doubt whether the country at large is as ready to accept this theory as it has been. It is getting some experience with half-baked legislation, and now in the bill before us we have some measures as to which the cookery has not even gone that far. We had already on our statute books undoubtedly the best law on the subject of trusts and combinations in restraint of trade possessed by any nation. It is a model of brevity, clearness, and of comprehensiveness. It has been tried again and again and never found wanting except when its failure was caused by incompetency, neglect, or something worse. It will not, of course, reach acts done in intrastate business. These can only be reached by the States themselves, although the framers of this bill seem to have overlooked this obvious rule.

Mr. Chairman, the bill is drawn on wrong lines. It undertakes to deal with specific acts, regardless of whether they are done in restraint of trade or for the purpose of creating a monopoly. In framing the bill it seems to have been forgotten that an act may be perfectly innocent and an aid to competition when done by a small dealer for the purpose of extending his trade, while the same act may be highly injurious when done by a large concern as a part of a far-reaching scheme for the purpose of creating a monopoly. It has been said by a member of the committee introducing the bill that the Sherman law merely reached acts done in restraint of trade, while this bill was intended to promote competition. Such a statement shows an utter misconception of the Sherman law. If restraint of trade be forbidden—and everyone concedes it is forbidden by the Sherman law—competition is free. We can not compel different concerns to compete, but we can compel them to give a free and fair field to competition with each other and forbid their combining with each other in restraint of trade and thus preventing competition. This is just what the Sherman law does. Restraint of trade, Mr. Chairman, is the exact converse of competition. Forbid restraint of trade and the door is thrown wide open for competition. The Sherman law provides for competition and at the same time it does not fetter business, because sales and contracts alike are left undisturbed where no restraint of trade is imposed.

Another great defect in the bill is that it undertakes to be specific, but finding that the attempt resulted in expressions either too broad or too narrow, it has been sought to remedy the difficulty by the use of indefinite terms. Who can even guess at the meaning of certain expressions used in the bill? For example, "wrongfully injure a competitor"; "arbitrarily refuse to sell"; "substantially lessen competition"; "legitimate purposes," and so forth. The committee itself seemed to be so uncertain of the effect of the bill that it not only inserted numerous provisos, but it was found necessary to follow these provisos with other provisos to the effect that no part of the bill should be construed to modify existing laws.

The result, if the bill becomes a law, will be to create doubt and uncertainty. The business man embarking upon a voyage of trade will not know which way to steer his vessel. The construction of the act will necessarily be involved in a fog of doubt, and until its uncertainties are settled the most honest may be in fear and the active will hesitate.

The bill will neither do the harm many expect nor the good which its authors anticipate. It is so crudely drawn that many of its provisions are meaningless, and it is so far from having any "teeth" that a corporation lawyer who could not drive a six-horse team and band wagon through nearly all of its provisions ought to be discharged at once. In some respects it actually weakens the Sherman law by providing a method of evading it.

Section 2 of the bill is a good example of the method which has been used in preparing the bill. This section forbids discrimination in prices in different localities, except such as is caused by making due allowance for transportation charges, and so forth. Yet the only way for a small concern to get a foothold in a new locality is to sell at first at a reduced price; otherwise it will be unable to get the business. In so doing competition is stimulated and a monopoly on the part of those who have been in control of that market can be prevented. But this section seems to place such transactions under the ban of the law. The large industries can easily establish branch houses in any desired locality, and thus evade the law entirely, although its purpose in lowering prices may be part of a plan to build up a monopoly and drive its competitors out of that locality. Thus the small concern may be punished, although its acts are not only innocent but in reality beneficial, while the big monopoly goes free. The effect of this section, if it has any effect, will not be to promote competition, but to destroy it, and its provisos legalize acts which are forbidden under the Sherman law when done as a part of a scheme to restrain trade.

Section 3 is so indefinite that no one can tell what it means. It is intended to compel those operating coal mines to sell to the public. It will have no such effect. No two persons have agreed as to what is the meaning of the word "arbitrarily," as used therein. If it means what the authors of the bill state, namely, "without any reason whatever," then the section has not the slightest effect. If it means what some others claim, it will embarrass the small dealer without in any way reaching the large dealer who has branch selling houses in each State. In any event, its meaning is so uncertain as to make its enforcement impracticable and its enactment useless, if not dangerous.

Section 4 strikes at the small dealer, who can not maintain an agency of his own in another State while the large dealer can maintain an agency therein, and by making his sales through such agency cause all such sales to be intrastate business and entirely escape the provisions of the section. Like the two preceeding sections it holds a club over the head of the small dealer and leaves open a wide door through which the big interests may escape.

Section 5 is included in the Sherman law as it now stands.

The first paragraph of section 7 does not include cooperative agricultural associations, and all amendments for that purpose were rejected. In its original form it contained nothing not already provided by law.

The second paragraph of section 7 is one of the most dangerous in the whole bill. It gives the railroads the privilege of making agreements with reference to rates and services which they shall perform regardless of whether they are competing lines or not. The railways have been trying for years to obtain this privilege, and heretofore Congress has always denied it. It is true that the bill excepts agreements to maintain rates, but this can easily be evaded as it does not forbid agreements to establish or fix rates. The provision that such agreements shall be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission does not help the situation. Inevitably competition is destroyed when such agreements are made, rates will be raised, and service heretofore rendered will be denied. The railways can agree upon slow trains, upon onerous conditions for shippers, and to refuse privileges heretofore granted. Whether intended or not this paragraph conceals a "joker" of the most dangerous kind.

Section 8 is a sham, pure and simple. It pretends to be that which it is not and which it can not be. It pretends to forbid the consolidation of competing railroad companies by means of holding companies. As an actual fact it facilitates such consolidation. It pretends to strengthen the Sherman law while it actually weakens it. It pretends to forbid the use of holding companies for the purposes of consolidating companies engaged in commerce. It actually provides that such holding companies may be organized instead of commanding their dissolution.

Mr. Chairman, it was held in the Northern Securities Co. case—and since that time no lawyer has pretended to doubt the principle—that competing lines of railways could not be joined by holding companies; that holding companies could not be organized that had even the potential power of preventing competition without violating the Sherman law. But under the provisions of this section, in order to establish a violation of the antitrust law we must go further and show that the competition has actually been lessened and prevented or a monopoly obtained. Nothing of that kind was required prior to the enactment of this section if it should become a law.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the third paragraph of this section, that does not even condemn a monopoly?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was about to allude to that. In the third paragraph of the section is found a series of exemptions which runs through the section until almost everything imaginable has been exempted. I read from one of the provisos:

> The section shall not apply to corporations purchasing stock for investment, or using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about a lessening of competition, nor shall it prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations, or from owning or holding all of part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations.

Under this provision, no matter how complete the monopoly, unless some action was taken by voting it would not fall under the ban of the law, while under the present law it is so well settled that a combination of competing lines is illegal that it is not necessary for the Department of Justice to bring a suit against railway companies which have been consolidated through a holding company or by the purchase of stock, whether one or the other. The simple statement of the Department of Justice that action will be brought to dissolve the combination has been sufficient to cause the railway companies attempting consolidation to yield immediately and consent to a dissolution.

Under this section (8) holding companies may be organized which can obtain the control of two competing lines, and then under the preceding section they may enter into any agreement that they choose to fix rates, to determine the service which they shall perform, and, in short, to absolutely eliminate competition.

This is what the committee has brought forward as something that will bring relief to the people. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is just what those in control of the railways have been seeking for. They now can say:

> This is the way I long have sought,
> And mourned because I found it not.

[Laughter.]

The majority of the Judiciary Committee have brought in what the railroads have been hounding the Interstate Commerce Commission for and demanding of Congress for lo these many years, and it has been refused them until this time. Now they have all the powers of consolidation they ever really wished and asked for in the two sections, and may consolidate under one section and agree on rates under the other. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this section should be stricken out. It serves no purpose. There never was any demand or reason for it, nor have gentlemen undertaken to give any reason why it should be adopted. The relief afforded by the Sherman law was ample. As the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has stated, this section is likely to furnish the means of evading the most valuable portion of the Sherman law which we now have on our statute books.

Complaints against this and the preceding section are answered by gentlemen on the other side by calling attention to provisions to the effect that these sections shall not be construed to permit acts illegal under the present law. But if these provisos are relied upon, why keep these sections in the bill? Why should we enact a law which we so much fear partially repeals the Sherman Act, that we are obliged to follow it by a proviso that it shall not be so construed? Could anything be more useless or confusing?

Section 12 is the so-called "personal-guilt section." It is claimed by the authors that it will attribute the guilt of the corporation to its officers. As a matter of fact, it will do nothing of the kind. As originally drawn, while I do not think that its authors intended that it should conceal a "joker," it was in fact a joke. In order to convict any individual of a violation of the antitrust laws it required a conviction first of the corporation and then of the individual—in other words, two convictions to show one crime. As amended, it is questionable whether it is any better. It may not now require two trials, but it certainly will require more evidence than was necessary under the Sherman law, and unless further amended this section will weaken this important statute instead of strengthening it.

There are some of the provisions of the bill that meet with my approval. The section extending the statute of limitations while a suit is pending against a trust is an excellent one and ought to have been enacted long ago. The proviso authorizing an individual as well as the Government to commence an equity action to restrain a threatened injury by some monopoly is also a good one, although I doubt whether as much good will be received therefrom as was expected. Section 6, as amended in the Committee of the Whole House, is excellent in its purpose, although there may be some doubt about its constitutionality, and I have no fault to find with its provisions with reference to labor organizations, which, in my opinion, merely state the law according to the best authorities.

The bill, taken as a whole, is a political measure, framed for purposes which are political, rather than those which would be for the benefit of the country at large. It is evidently intended to hold it up before the country as an example of legislative activity on the part of the Democratic administration, which is determined to do something, "right or wrong." It demonstrates the inability of a Democratic Congress to frame constructive laws under which business can thrive; the laborer receive his just reward; competition be free; and predatory interests restrained. No great constructive measure has ever yet been made a law through that party which did not in a few months after enactment become so unpopular that the people could not repeal it soon enough. The form of this bill does not indicate any improvement in the capacity of that party for government.

The antitrust provisions of the bill are simply buncombe, designed to give the country the impression that the Democratic Party was redeeming its party pledges, and by the inclusion of some good provisions, to place the Republican Members of this House in a false light. If I should vote against the bill, I realize that it would be claimed that I was voting against measures which would tend to suppress the trusts and also against policies in regard to labor organizations which I have always favored. I do not propose to be put in such a position. For years I have worked to make the laws against trusts more efficient, and I have always been in favor of giving labor its just dues, although I have not been willing to select any particular class and grant it a special privilege. I am not in any way responsible for any of the defective provisions in this bill. I have repeatedly spoken in opposition to them on the floor of this House. I have offered amendments myself and have supported those offered by others which would have eliminated its evil features and made it more efficient in controlling trusts without in any way interfering with legitimate business. But amendment after amendment has been voted down regardless of their merit. It has become so plain, Mr. Chairman, that the Democratic majority is not intending to prevent acts which restrain trade or create monopolies that it is useless to offer amendments further. Their whole purpose is to make a showing regardless of whether anything is accomplished in the way of curbing monopoly. If there was any prospect that this bill would become a law in its present form, I would not give it my vote; but no one expects anything of the kind. The bill is introduced for appearance, well knowing that it never will become a law as it now stands, and in the expectation that it will not even be considered by the Senate before the congressional elections.

The hope is that its high-sounding phrases, which can be understood by no one, will deceive the people and ensnare their opponents. I will not walk into such a trap. As I have stated, I have long been working among the ranks of those who are opposed to trusts and monopolies. Years ago I was selected by the governor of Iowa as a delegate to and attended the convention held at Chicago to consider measures against trusts—the first ever held in this country for that purpose—and I have always been in favor of giving the laboring man the right to organize. On prior occasions when measures giving the workingmen their rights have been before the House I have supported them by my voice and by my vote. I decline now to be put in the attitude of opposing the principles which I have before advocated by reason of my vote upon a bill the antitrust provisions of which are a mere pretense and a sham.

The attempt which has been made in this bill is entirely in the wrong direction. The Sherman law, as I believe, is amply sufficient to reach all restraint of trade and monopoly exercised or attempted in interstate commerce. It is true that evils now exist, but they exist partly through lack of enforcement of the Sherman law and partly because the wrongful acts are committed in intrastate commerce—that is, wholly within the boundaries of a single State—and are not within the jurisdiction of Congress. Many, if not most, of the evils at which this bill is aimed can only be reached through State laws. I regret to say that the laws of my own State are not what they should be on this subject, and we need therein a broad and comprehensive measure like the Sherman Act. We need, especially on the part of our national authorities, a fearless and thorough enforcement of the Federal law which, it is unnecessary to say, we are not receiving. We need also a Federal law requiring all concerns doing an interstate business to come under its jurisdiction, and a provision that as a penalty for a failure to observe such antitrust laws the privilege of transacting such business will be withdrawn. Then, and then only, in my judgment, will the great combinations which now are a menace to our national existence be properly curbed and restrained, and to this end I shall direct my best efforts.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill if I might. On page 25 this language is inserted, this being the section in regard to holding of stock by one corporation in another corporation:

This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition.

The first provision is:

This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment.

Of course, that includes any stock that is purchased for investment, and all stock is purchased for investment when it is purchased at all. Then there is the exception—

And not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition.

That would not apply to voting for the election of officers, would it?

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand. Is the gentleman consuming five minutes under the rule, or is he trying to provoke debate?

Mr. MANN. I am trying to get some information which seems difficult to obtain.

Mr. CARLIN. Is the gentleman speaking in his own time?

Mr. MANN. I am speaking in my own time, I believe, under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CARLIN. That is what I wanted to get at. What is the question?

Mr. MANN. What does this exception mean? Here is a provision which says that this section shall not apply to corporations purchasing stock solely for investment, with an exception, and the exception is—

And not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition.

That would not prevent voting the stock they purchase.

Mr. CARLIN. I think not, unless they were voting it with that object in view.

Mr. MANN. How would it be possible to show that they were voting the stock for the purpose of bringing about the lessening of competition? They vote stock for officers, and they may vote stock as to the issuance of other stock or bonds, but they do not vote stock as to the policy of the corporation.

Mr. CARLIN. If they voted that stock for sale to a holding company, the object of which would be combination with a competing company, that would be one way in which they would bring themselves within the provisions of this statute.

Mr. MANN. But there is another provision in reference to holding companies.

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; but this is the holding company provision that we are discussing now. The gentleman is discussing the holding company provision of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I am discussing the question of where one company buys the stock of another. You say it shall not apply where they buy stock for investment, unless they vote it to lessen competition.

Mr. CARLIN. That is right.

Mr. MANN. They do not vote to lessen competition in any case.

Mr. CARLIN. They could vote stock in violation of section 9, which follows, in the election of interlocking directorates, and by reason of that fact competition might be lessened—any number of various specific acts which go to bring about the lessening of competition might be done through stock voting or otherwise.

Mr. MANN. Under this section one corporation can buy and own the stock of another, and it can vote that stock unless it be proven that it voted for the purpose of substantially lessening competition.

Mr. CARLIN. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it means anything.

[Mr. FARR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, as all time has expired, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a few words.

Mr. CARLIN. How much time does the gentleman expect to use?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Five minutes.

Mr. CARLIN. Very well.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the colloquy that has just taken place between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Virginia, I desire to call to the attention of this House the Northern Securities Co. case. That case originated in my country, and I think I know a little about it. That company was formed for the purpose of holding stock purely as an investment. Upon the trial of that action the company showed that it had never given any direction whatever to the officers of the Northern Pacific or the Great Northern Railroad, the two railroad companies combined in the Northern Securities Co.

The company itself had no power whatever to run a railroad. Here was a case on all fours with the one you provide for in paragraph 3 of this section, but did the court take the view that this consolidation did not restrain trade? Not at all. As I said before, the court saw just as clearly as any man in his senses could see that such an organization necessarily destroyed competition, because when the Northern Securities Co. became the owner of the two railroads competition would necessarily cease. It would not be necessary to do anything to direct the officers of the two railroads not to compete. They knew that every dollar expended for the purpose of competition as between those two was money taken away from the Northern Securities Co., and as a consequence taken from the company for which they were working. Now, this bill clearly legalizes just that sort of an arrangement, and you know that practically every combination in restraint of trade that has been formed in this country in the last 15 or 20 years has been formed in this same fashion, and still you legalize that sort of a combination. It seems to me so clear that I must confess I can not understand how this committee expects to defend it. It can not be defended. I think you owe to the country a frank statement as to the purpose of this section. If it is for the purpose of wiping out the Sherman antitrust law, let us know it, and we will go before the country on that issue. If, on the other hand, you pretend that it does not, it seems to me we are entitled to an explanation before you write it into the statute.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after the period in line 2, page 27, the following paragraph:

"Nor shall anything in the antitrust laws be construed to forbid persons operating local telephone exchanges engaged in commerce from selling their local exchanges to competitors for local business, or from acquiring local exchanges from competitors for local business, when such sale or acquisition is not forbidden by any law of the State or locality where the exchange is situated and competition in the transmission of interstate toll messages is not interrupted nor interfered with: Provided, That where such sale or purchase will affect commerce it shall not be permitted until the terms thereof have been submitted to and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reach an agreement as to how long we shall have debate on this and all other amendments. Are there any other amendments desired to be offered to this section?

Mr. BROWN of New York. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be concluded in 20 minutes, 10 minutes to be controlled by myself and 10 minutes by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MANN. There are three gentlemen who want five minutes apiece.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending section and all amendments thereto be closed in 20 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Chairman, the whole theory of all antitrust legislation is that competition for patronage is beneficial to the public, but there is at least one business in which it is not beneficial but is injurious to the public. The existence of two good, well-patronized telephone systems in any community makes it necessary for every business man in the community to patronize both systems. I believe that every local telephone exchange should be owned by the municipality in which it is located or by the Government, and that all long-distance systems should be owned and operated by the Government. But whether or not we agree about that we certainly should not disagree upon the proposition that wherever there is real competition between any two local telephone exchanges it is a burden and not a benefit to the public in that locality.

The amendment I propose will simply authorize the owners of one exchange to purchase the exchange of another when not forbidden by the law of the State or locality, and when competition in the transmission of interstate-toll messages is not interfered with nor interrupted.

I happen to live in a town where we have two systems, one exchange is located in Texas and the other in Arkansas, and I wish to make it certain that my people will not always be compelled to patronize and maintain two telephone systems. I dare say there are other towns in the United States that are similarly located, and that feel the same burden that my town does.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. VAUGHAN. I yield.

Mr. WEBB. Will the coalition of these two exchanges substantially lessen competition?

Mr. VAUGHAN. It will lessen competition for the patronage of the people. The people in the town will not be compelled to patronize two telephone systems.

Mr. WEBB. How about the interstate rates?

Mr. VAUGHAN. The amendment I propose provides that the purchase or acquisition shall be permitted only when competition for the transmission of interstate toll messages is not interfered with, and whenever commerce would be affected thereby, it is not permitted until it has been submitted to and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WEBB. Why do you say "where messages are not interfered with or interrupted"? Why not say "competition in the transmission of interstate toll messages is not substantially lessened"? That is the language that is used in other provisions.

Mr. VAUGHAN. If the committee will accept my amendment, I will agree to that change in the language.

Mr. WEBB. If it does not substantially lessen competition, it does not apply to the interstate telephone exchanges at all. That is already in the bill.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Why not make it plain that a transaction which could not injuriously affect but would benefit is not forbidden by this bill, which may be construed to forbid what the committee must admit can not be any violation of the spirit or the purpose of antitrust legislation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the report on the next bill for consideration under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the report on the next bill to be considered under the rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the report referred to:

[House Report No. 681, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 20 OF THE ACT TO REGULATE COMMERCE.

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 16586:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

Since reporting H. R. 16133 to the House your committee agreed upon some additional amendments and concluded to incorporate them, as well as the committee amendments already agreed upon and reported together with the original text in a new bill, which was accordingly introduced by the author of H. R. 16133 and, by subsequent order of the committee, is hereby reported to the House with a recommendation that it be considered by the House in lieu of H. R. 16133.

The bill herewith reported proposes certain amendments to section 20 of the act to regulate commerce, which has for many years authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission to acquire all necessary information touching the condition of carriers as to physical property, their stocks and bonds, all of their accounts, reports, and details and methods of doing business. The commission found the act in some respects defective as to the authority conferred, and the amendments proposed in this bill in the first 11 pages are designed to supply the needed authority. The authority conferred by the terms of section 20 was not broad enough to cover the subjects, knowledge of which it was necessary to acquire, inasmuch as it did not authorize the examination of books, papers, contracts, and correspondence of construction companies and other persons, natural and artificial, with which the carriers might have dealings of a character injurious to the transaction of interstate commerce. Neither did this provision confer authority to compel the production and furnishing of all information, books, accounts, correspondence, documents, and other papers. Neither did the terms of the section provide for the public and the stock and bond holders themselves the necessary publicity deemed so essential to the proper conduct of all public and quasi public business. It is thought by the commission and by your committee that the amendments proposed to the text, all of which amendments are indicated by being included in brackets and appear on the first 11 pages of the bill, are not only all necessary, but also will go far to supply defects in existing law.

The amendments offered in the first 11 pages are in pursuance of the recommendations of the celebrated stock and bond commission headed by Dr. Hadley, which thoroughly studied the entire question and made recommendations in line with the amendments hereinbefore referred to. Many witnesses before your committee thought that these amendments if made would constitute the only legislation necessary in the way of regulating the issuance of stocks and bonds. Some members of your committee concurred in that opinion, and all conceded that such amendments were necessary whether additional legislation were enacted on the subject of stocks and bonds or not. However, on mature deliberation and full hearing your committee concluded that there was a very general belief throughout the country that something should be done by the Federal Government in the nature of constituting a veto power in the interest of stability and efficiency of the carriers themselves to prevent them from impairing their financial strength and consequently injuring or destroying their capacity to perform their function to the public as common carriers. There is no doubt of the power of Congress to authorize the exercise of such a veto power if necessary to protect the carriers against the cupidity or incompetency of their own directorates or the avarice and exploitation of speculators who would use their power to wreck the carriers in order to realize sudden and large gains. There is a popular belief that for that very purpose of protecting the carriers in their stability and financial ability to discharge their duties to the public it is necessary to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to prevent the assumption by the carriers of obligations of any character which would weaken their capacity as common carriers or tend in any way to impair their ability to afford proper facilities and service to the public.

As section 20 of the act to regulate commerce had already authorized the commission to secure information of stocks and bonds and financial condition of the carriers, it was thought proper to perfect this provision to carry out the purposes intended, and it appeared peculiarly appropriate to incorporate by amendment in the same section the veto power upon the overissue of stocks and bonds because the two provisions are entirely cognate and germane one to the other. With the provisions beginning at the bottom of page 11 and occupying page 12, authorizing the commission to pass upon every proposed issue of stock and bonds, section 20, as amended in the preceding 11 pages, becomes more valuable than ever, because it will enable the commission through its regulatory instrumentalities to keep itself constantly supplied with information as to the actual condition of all carriers, and thus be enabled to meet and checkmate any improper effort that may be made to secure approval of an issue of stock or bonds. So that if the provisions conferring authority for such investigation and veto power are adopted, it will be only the more valuable by reason of the context in the preceding 11 pages, and if those provisions following the first 11 pages should not be adopted, then section 20 as amended in the first 11 pages of the bill would be sufficient to afford great relief in themselves. It will be noted that your committee has provided against any possible friction or conflict of jurisdiction between the Federal commission and the State authorities by requiring that notice of every application for approval of stock and bond issues shall be given to the regulatory authority of the State concerned, so that such authority may appear and be heard on the proposition. There is no doubt in our mind that that provision will rapidly lead up to a satisfactory working of the law and to absolute harmony and agreement between the two authorities.

The provision prohibiting the overissuance of stocks and bonds may be enforced by either one of two provisions offered in the bill. One is by injunction against acts declared to be unlawful and the other is by criminal prosecution for their violation.

Your committee has seen proper to provide and report another provision in the bill prohibiting common or interlocking directorates and management. When we learned that the Judiciary Committee was not undertaking to deal with the directorates of railroad companies we then heeded what appears to be a public and almost universal demand to prohibit interlocking directorates of carriers. Whether the necessity for this provision is so great as represented or not, and whether the anticipated benefits are exaggerated or not, there is a general impression that most of the wreck and ruin of railroads and consequent damage to public service and the public interest has been due to the machinations of men who managed different corporations, and by the policies adopted for the different corporations constituting a system or about to be consolidated into a system wrought ruin to some or all of the carriers involved. It has been represented to us that that practice has ceased, that railroad men are now no longer dishonest or incompetent, and that it is a matter of convenience for the same men to handle different enterprises without having to consult so many different people; but our observation is that there are good men enough in the world to fill every responsible position and then not have enough positions to go around, and we observe, in answer to the suggestion, that if the practice has ceased the provision in the law will not hurt anybody, for no man will be punished unless he is guilty. If any rash man should decide in the future to break out and imitate some of the disastrous escapades of the past, the law would be here to give him justice for his misdeeds. It has further been urged that in the case of large systems, formed by the consolidation of many smaller corporations, it is not necessary to have different directors for all the minor corporations. We answer that it is not necessary to have these consolidations; and the most vicious thing about all combinations in transportation and all other kinds of business is that, while they multiply the benefits of the few men retained, they dispense with the services of so many men both competent to fill the position and entitled to the fair emoluments thereof. We have thought it liberal enough to provide for relief in extreme cases through the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The date is postponed two years, and if any case exists where it is necessary to the interests of the public or the preservation of the property and the maintanence of facilities of transportation that any man should be a director or officer in more than one corporation, your committee believes that the public and the carriers can trust the Interstate Commerce Commission to pass on the question. This provision is germane and cognate to the preceding provisions of the bill, for the reason that the officers and directors of a carrier initiate all actions issuing stock and bonds, which form the subject of previous provisions of the bill.

The further complaint that the penalties prescribed are drastic is, in our opinion, not well taken. Punishments which fine a corporation are nugatory. The fines are paid out of the treasury of the corporation; no man suffers in the flesh, as he feels no punishment as a violator of the law; and the capacity of the corporation is weakened to the amount of money taken out of its treasury. That is a vicious system, as it is liable to make the public suffer through the infliction of inferior service and allows the culprits to go free instead of punishing them in person and takes much-needed money from the corporate treasury. There is but one way to make malefactors fear the law, and that is to inflict personal punishment, and the severity of that punishment should be proportionate to the crime committed. The man who will unblushingly take advantage of his power afforded by his position in the financial world to wreck the facilities and ability of a carrier to discharge its duties to the public besides buncoing innocent investors out of hundreds of millions of dollars and embarrassing other innocent investors by unloading upon them worthless stocks and bonds is worth of the most severe human punishment, and for that reason your committee has left the punishment of such violators to the discretion of the court.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] is recognized for two minutes.

[Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. CARLIN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. VAUGHAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. CARLIN. How much time did the gentleman from Texas use?

Mr. VAUGHAN. Five minutes.

[Mr. HENRY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. VAUGHAN].

Mr. CARLIN. I thought I would allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROWN] to offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROWN] will not be in order until this amendment is disposed of.

Mr. CARLIN. Then I will use a part of my time now and use a part of it later.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is the most remarkable one that has been offered during the consideration of this bill. While it was stated that it is a simple little amendment seemingly, allowing States to regulate their own telephone exchanges, the fact is that this amendment exempts the American Bell Telephone Co. from a decree of the court rendered within the last few months in a dissolution proceeding on behalf of the United States Government.

That company combined, as they admitted, in State after State, telephone company after telephone company until they had monopolized the telephone business of the United States, and when suit was threatened for dissolution they consented to the decree, and now we have an amendment which will eliminate that decree.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. They bought out all the telephone exchanges in my part of the country, and as soon as they had done that the first thing they did was to raise the price.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the usual course.

Mr. CARLIN. This amendment says:

Nor shall anything in the antitrust laws be construed to forbid persons operating local telephone exchanges engaged in commerce from selling their local exchanges to competitors for local business, or from acquiring local exchanges from competitors for local business, when such sale or acquisition is not forbidden by any law of the State or locality where the exchange is situated.

And by the system of purchase and sale they have been able to form a great combination which the Government has just dissolved. It seems to me it needs but to mention it to show that the committee can not consent to accept this amendment, and that it has no place in this bill.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CARLIN. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Let us use a concrete illustration. Suppose in the town of Horatio, Ark., the Southwestern Telephone Co. own not only the long-distance line but the local exchange. Suppose in the town of De Queen, Ark., 9 miles north, there is a company that owns both the local and the long-distance lines. The long-distance line runs into Oklahoma, the State line being only 8 miles away. The line also runs out over three or four counties having a rural system. Suppose that the Southwestern Telephone Co., at Horatio, should sell its local exchange to the man who owned the De Queen exchange and the country exchanges. Do you mean to say that that would be inimical to the public good? Do not you think that that ought to be permitted?

Mr. CARLIN. I am not sure that I understand the gentleman's question, but what I mean is that the combination of a number of competing telephone exchanges engaged in interstate business so that it is controlled by one corporation is a combination in restraint of trade.

Mr. WINGO. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CARLIN. And this is what this amendment permits.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no. If I thought that, I would not advocate it. Does not the amendment say that one competitor may sell its local exchange to another competitor so long as it does not violate the State law and does not restrain interstate commerce?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Oh, the gentleman from Texas is mistaken. The amendment reads:

Nor shall anything in the antitrust laws be construed to forbid persons operating local telephone exchanges engaged in commerce from selling their local exchanges to competitors for local business or from acquiring local exchanges from competitors for local business when such sale or acquisition is not forbidden by any law of the State or locality where the exchange is situated and competition in the transmission of interstate toll messages is not interrupted or interfered with.

Mr. WINGO. Is not that what I said?

Mr. CARLIN. If the exchanges are within the State, we have no control over it.

Mr. WINGO. I call attention to this: Unfortunately for the situation, the gentleman from Texas—from Texarkana—has a concrete proposition. In my district there is a railroad that wiggles in and out across the State line. I have given you a concrete illustration of a sale which took place less than a week ago, and I know it is for the public good and does not create a monopoly, but tends to the betterment in the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VAUGHAN) there were—ayes 11, noes 22.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the follow-amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, line 19, after the word "investment," add the words "or for investment and operation."

Mr. BROWN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of clarification only, because I do not know what the result of this paragraph is going to be. At the present time there is $5,500,000,000 invested in the securities of holding companies who operate public-utility companies subject to State regulation by the public-utility commissions in the various States. If these holding companies under State regulation do not bring about, or attempt to bring about, as the language of the bill reads, a substantial lessening of competition, I assume that this committee has no desire to interfere with the extension of their lawful business. But in the way the bill is drawn, Mr. Chairman, all future operations by holding companies may be unlawful for three reasons.

In the first place, in the district of Michigan two Federal judges recently held that for a corporation to sell its securities in more than one State constituted interstate commerce. Again in the State of Texas it is held that ownership of a gas-producing company and an electric-light company in the same location, no matter how much they may be regulated as to price of output and quality of service, is ownership of technically competing companies. Again it might be well held that the distribution of supplies from the parent holding company to the various plants in the various States would be interstate commerce. Therefore, in order to clarify these matters, I trust that the committee will consent to the adoption of this amendment in order that public-utility holding companies may continue their lawful business under the operation not only of the present law, but also under the provisions of this very able bill.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, we oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. We think that we have made all exceptions in this provision of the bill that ought to be made. We have made so many exceptions that some of our friends on the opposite side claim that the provisions of this section amount to nothing. We think we have already placed and incorporated in the section proper limitations; and this amendment is as objectionable as the one voted down a few moments ago, and more so, for the reason that it is general, while that undertook to exempt a specific thing. This excepts broadly these investment companies, and we object to it.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that so far as the $5,000,000,000 are invested in public utility corporations, if they are legal now, they will continue to be legal notwithstanding this act, because we specifically exempt those which are not illegal at present. If they are not legal under the present law, we certainly would not want to be put in the attitude of legalizing them in this act, and therefore I think it would be a very dangerous provision to put in the bill at this time. I trust the committee will vote it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person who is engaged as an individual, or who is a member of a partnership, or is a director or other officer of a corporation that is engaged in the business, in whole or in part, of producing or selling equipment, materials, or supplies to, or in the construction or maintenance of, railroads or other common carriers engaged in commerce, shall act as a director or other officer or employee of any other corporation or common carrier engaged in commerce to which he, or such patnership or corporation, sells or leases, directly or indirectly, equipment, mateials, or supplies, or for which he or such partnership or corporation, directly or indirectly, engages in the work of construction or maintenance; and after the expiration of said period no person who is engaged as an individual or who is a member of a partnership or is a director or other officer of a corporation which is engaged in the conduct of a bank or trust company shall act as a director or other officer or employee of any such common carrier for which he or such partnership or bank or trust company acts, either separately or in connection with others, as agent for or underwriter of the sale or disposal by such common carrier of issues or parts of issues of its securities, or from which he or such partnership or bank or trust company purchases, either separately or in connection with others, issues or parts of issues of securities of such common carrier.

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person shall at the same time be a director or other officer or employee of more than one bank, banking association, or trust company organized or operating under the laws of the United States either of which has deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000; and no private banker or person who is a director in any bank or trust company, organized and operating under the laws of a State, having deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000, shall be eligible to be a director in any bank or banking association organized or operating under the laws of the United States. The eligibility of a director under the foregoing provisions shall be determined by the average amount of deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits as shown in the official statements of such bank, banking association, or trust company filed as provided by law during the fiscal year next preceding the date set for the annual election of directors, and when a director has been elected in accordance with the provisions of this act it shall be lawful for him to continue as such for one year thereafter under said election.

No bank, banking association, or trust company organized or operating under the laws of the United States in any city or incorporated town or village of more than 100,000 inhabitants, as shown by the last preceding decennial census of the United States, shall have as a director or other officer or employee any private banker or any director or other officer or employee of any other bank, banking association, or trust company located in the same place: Provided, That nothing in this section shall apply to mutual savings banks not having a capital stock represented by shares: Provided further, That a director or other officer or employee of such bank, banking association, or trust company may be a director or other officer or employee of not more than one other bank or trust company organized under the laws of the United States or any State where the entire capital stock of one is owned by stockholders in the other: And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall forbid a director of class A of a Federal reserve bank, as defined in the Federal reserve act, from being an officer or director or both an officer and director in one member bank.

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person at the same time shall be a director in any two or more corporations, either of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, engaged in whole or in part in commerce, other than common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, if such corporations are or shall have been theretofore, by virtue of their business and location of operation, competitors, so that an elimination of competition by agreement between them would constitute a violation of any of the provisions of any of the antitrust laws. The eligibility of a director under the foregoing provision shall be determined by the aggregate amount of the capital, surplus, and undivided profits, exclusive of dividends declared but not paid to stockholders, at the end of the fiscal year of said corporation next preceding the election of directors, and when a director has been elected in accordance with the provisions of this act it shall be lawful for him to continue as such for one year thereafter.

That any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of $100 a day for each day of the continuance of such violation, or by imprisonment for such period as the court may designate, not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment on page 29, line 18, to strike out the word "entire" at the end of the line and insert the words "not less than three-fourths of the," so that the provision shall read:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall apply to mutual savings banks not having a capital stock represented by shares: Provided further, That a director or other officer or employee of such bank, banking association, or trust company may be a director or other officer or employee of not more than one other bank or trust company organized under the laws of the United States or any State where the entire capital stock of one is owned by stockholders in the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 18, strike out the word "entire," at the end of the line, and insert in lieu thereof the words "not less than three-fourths of the."

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, it is well known to every man in the House who has had any connection with the banking business, and especially with national banks, that in the last five or six years there has been organized, in conjunction with national banks, trust companies. The stock of the trust company has almost universally been owned by the bank of which the trust company was an auxiliary, but where a former stockholder happened to die and the stock has been distributed, it is sometimes impossible for the banking company to own the entire stock. I have one or two instances in mind where it would work a hardship to the bank that sought to control all the stock of the trust company which was organized for the purpose of carrying long-time loans or building loans for the benefit of the bank's customers.

It would be impossible after the distribution of the stock of a deceased stockholder in some instances to get all of the stock. Of course, I understand it is the purpose of the law to make the bank and the auxiliary institution one banking institution, but I do not understand why they can not be protected just as easily with a control of three-fourths of the stock or more as with a control of the entire stock. It still would constitute one banking institution. Take the instance I have in mind. It is impossible for the bank to secure $200 of outstanding stock, and that under the bill would compel the bank that has the trust company in connection with it to close out the trust company business, to close out the long-time or building loans that it is accommodating its customers with, and I am at a loss to see what advantage it would be to compel the bank to have the entire stock when three-fourths of the stock is as effectual to prevent evil effects arising from interlocking directorates as all of it would be. It seems to me that the full purpose is accomplished by compelling the bank to have three-fourths of the stock and not to require the banks that fall under these conditions to close out their trust-company business.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, we desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana. We do not think that there is anything in this interlocking-directorate provision in this bill that will cause anybody to close out their business. We have not undertaken in this bill to deal with the stocks or to prevent common ownership of stocks, but we are attempting to prevent a well-known evil in the business world, an evil not only to the general public, but an evil to every stockholder in this Nation. The corporate business, honestly and properly managed, is the most desirable system of business ever devised by man. While that is true, it furnishes the greatest opportunity for dishonesty of any form of business. Whenever you permit the directors of banks and of different concerns to control these different concerns, you may rest assured that those directors are going to control the business of the several concerns in such a way that they will get the greatest profit and advantage out of it to themselves or to the particular concern in which they are most deeply interested. To give you an illustration, before the Judiciary Committee, in an investigation of another matter, we had before the committee a director of two coal companies who was also a director of a railroad company. He negotiated a deal between the two coal companies. He was a director in both, and then approved it as the director of the railroad company, and he was asked by a member of the committee if he could see any possible way whereby his personal interests could suffer in such a transaction, and he frankly admitted that he could not.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at this point. I will in a moment. The object of this whole provision is in the interest of honesty, not only in the interest of the general public, but in the interest of the stockholders of the corporations themselves. The objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana is this: We have a provision in the bill that where the stockholders of one company own all the stock of the other, there may be interlocking directors.

Mr. CULLOP. But that bank would have to be located in a city or village of not less than 100,000 inhabitants.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Of more.

Mr. CULLOP. The provision in the bill is:

No bank, banking association, or trust company organized or operating under the laws of the United States in any city or incorporated town or village of more than 100,000 inhabitants.

It would not apply to banks in a city of 50,000.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That proviso would.

Mr. CULLOP. I do not think so.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The proviso would apply anywhere in any kind of a city where the stockholders of one own the entire stock of another.

Mr. CULLOP. Well——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Now, the object of this legislation is to prevent the concentration of capital under one control. In the Pujo investigation it developed that four or five concerns in New York, through a system of interlocking directorates, controlled practically the finances of this country, and then it finally centered in one great concern in New York.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do.

Mr. CLINE. But you provide in this bill that a national bank may have an auxiliary in the shape of a trust company.

Mr. CARLIN. May have one.

Mr. CLINE. Providing they own the entire stock. Now, what advantage does the law get in securing any of the stock above 75 per cent of the stock where they only seek to hold joint relationship with another company?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Well, the point is this: Where they own the entire stock the tendency would not be to concentrate, but would be rather to divide up, divide their capital; it is one ownership practically, and could at will draw the entire amount back into one concern, but if we except banks owning not less than 75 per cent of the stock of the other, it seems that we will leave a loophole that will permit the control and concentration of money that we are endeavoring to prohibit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Let me explain how this works. Your committee gave great consideration to this whole question, and especially to the question of the exemption of one trust company. Let me submit that since the adoption of the currency law the necessity that caused the creation of trust companies in connection with national banks does not exist to the same extent that it did previous to the adoption of that law, because under the old law a national bank could not lend money on real estate, and hence a trust company became an adjunct and handmaid of the national-banking system in order that they might do certain things which the banks were prohibited from doing under the law.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at this point. I want to make my point clear. Now, we gave very careful consideration to this provision and to every phase of the question, and you will bear in mind we have no jurisdiction over the State banks. We excluded the private banker, the State bank director, and the trust company director from a directorship on national banks upon the theory and question of qualification. We are allowed to prescribe the qualifications of the directors of national banks, and in prescribing and fixing the qualifications of the directors of national banks we provide in this bill that the private banker, the State bank director, and the director in the trust company shall not be eligible to be directors in national banks. Now, if you permit common directors in two banks on a percentage system, then you provide a condition where through the trust company or the State bank these great national banking institutions can have an affiliated trust company, and if you permit that affiliated trust company the national bank can maintain these interlocking connections with State banks and trust companies, and you thus permit the evil of interlocking directorates which in a somewhat different way heretofore obtained, as we believe, to the detriment of the public and especially to the detriment of the stockholders of the banks.

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield just for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not wish to take issue with the committee, but can not you do it under this bill as it is framed where you allow the directors to be on a national bank and on a State bank at the same time, providing the stock is in the same ownership? It seems to me you allow the very thing you do not want to do.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That would be an extreme case.

Mr. PHELAN. But you are not limiting it to one of these cases.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It will be only one, and such a case would be rare indeed, and it would be of short duration where they own the entire stock, because the very moment a common ownership ceased and a part of the stock went into other hands there would be the inhibition of the law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is talking about a provision that covers cases in my town which I am somewhat familiar with. Take, for example, the case of the First National Bank of Chicago. There is the First National Savings & Deposit Co.——

Mr. FITZHENRY. The First Trust & Savings Co.

Mr. MANN. Yes. It is fixed so that you can not sell the stock of the one without selling the stock of the other.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes. That is done in the case of a bank that I know of.

Mr. MANN. They do a trust business. In this case that I speak of there is no chance for the stock to become scattered. You can not buy the stock of the First Trust without buying at the same time the stock of the First National, and you can not buy the First National stock without buying the First Trust stock. There is some arrangement by which that is held in that condition. Now, of course, if that were not the case no one could tell whether they owned all the stock, or three-quarters of the stock, or half the stock. A man to-day might be a legal director and to-morrow he might be a criminal.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We provide against that.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. CULLOP. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. In the case that the gentleman from Illinois speaks of as an illustration, that institution also deals with real estate, renting, mortgages, and so forth; guardianships; acts as administrator of estates, receiverships, and things that a national bank could not do.

Mr. MANN. It is a trust company.

Mr. CULLOP. It has outside earnings and outside profits and does business which national banks under the laws can not engage in, can they?

Mr. MANN. I do not say whether a national bank could or not. I think they do it sometimes.

Mr. CULLOP. A national bank could not collect rents from real estate and perform the duties incident to receiverships, guardianships, and things like that.

Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas about a case that has been presented to me, where there is a national bank with deposits, profits, and capital stock of more than $2,500,000. Is there anything in this measure to prevent any director or stockholder or officer of that bank from being a director or other officer of a State or private bank that may be organized in the same county?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. In the same place?

Mr. CULLOP. In the same county.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. For instance, the stockholders of a national bank in a county seat will have, out in some little town, a State bank or a private bank, which becomes a feeder to the national bank at the county seat.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Did the gentleman say less than $2,500,000?

Mr. CULLOP. No; I said more than $2,500,000.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It is prohibited.

Mr. CULLOP. What is there in this measure to prohibit a director in a bank of that kind being a director in a State bank in the same county, in the same State, that will have perhaps $100,000 of capital stock and undivided profits, deposits, and so forth?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The wording of the bill prevents it.

Mr. CULLOP. I deny there is, and if there is I would like to have the gentleman point it out.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. On page 29, on line 4, there is this provision:

> No bank, banking association, or trust company organized or operating under the laws of the United States in any city or incorporated town or village of more than 100,000 inhabitants, as shown by the last preceding decennial census of the United States, shall have as a director or other officer or employee any private banker or any director or other officer or employee of any other bank, banking association, or trust company located in the same place.

No; that is not the provision I had in mind.

Mr. CULLOP. Does not the gentleman mean to refer to page 28, beginning line 8

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes. The other was not the right provision. This provision reads:

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person shall at the same time be a director or other officer or employee of more than one bank, banking association, or trust company organized or operating under the laws of the United States either of which has deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000——

Mr. CULLOP. That applies to national banks only, and does not refer to State or private banks.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Wait until I get through. I read further:

And no private banker or person who is a director in any bank or trust company, organized and operating under the laws of a State, having deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000, shall be eligible to be a director in any bank or banking association organized or operating under the laws of the United States.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, if the gentleman will permit right there, in order to make that prohibition it would have to be a private bank with a capital and surplus and profits and deposits amounting to $2,500,000. It does not apply to State and private banks with a smaller sum.

If it was a bank of $100,000, then a director or officer in the national bank that had more than $2,500,000 could be a director in that State bank, and there is nothing here to prohibit it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think I can make the gentleman understand that it is absolutely prohibitive.

Mr. CULLOP. If there is anything, I shall be glad to have the gentleman do so. I am asking the question for information.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will try to make it plain. I think it is prohibitive. It says:

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act—

Mr. CULLOP. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I am reading from line 8, page 28—

No person shall at the same time be a director or other officer or employee of more than one bank, banking association, or trust company organized or operating under the laws of the United States either of which has deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000.

The words "either of which" would cover it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes, because I consider this a profitable discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. As I stated at the outset we deal with the eligibility of the bank directors, and if either of these banks specified has the capital, surplus, and so forth, then the person can not be at the same time a director in the two. That provision would exclude him. That is, if he was a director in the little bank, he would be ineligible to be a director in the large bank, for the reason that the provision relates to his eligibility, and he could not be in both of them. One might be a very small bank.

Mr. CULLOP. But if the gentleman will begin at the semicolon and read the next subdivision of the paragraph, and then construe that with the previous provision that he has read. I think he will find that if one of those banks is a private bank or a State bank there is nothing in this provision that will prohibit one of the directors in the national bank with a capital, deposits, and profits amounting to more than $2,500,000 from being a director in the private or State bank, provided it has not a capital, deposits, and surplus of more than $2,500,000. Now, I have asked that question because I have had bankers writing me about that subject from my district. A number of them are interested in small banks in different localities. I have examined the bill carefully, and I can find nothing to prohibit the same.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will answer the gentleman's question.

There is nothing in this bill to prevent that.

Mr. McCOY. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to line 14, page 28—

And no private banker—

Now go down to line 18—

shall be eligible to be a director in any bank or banking association organized or operating under the laws of the United States.

Does not that absolutely exclude private bankers?

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, no.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, no.

Mr. CULLOP. He can not be in two banks organized under the laws of the United States, but there is not a word excluding him from the State bank or private bank. If there is, I would be glad to have it pointed out.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to say, further——

Mr. CARLIN. It was not intended to do that.

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman means two State banks, we can not prohibit his being a director of both. We have nothing to do with that, or at any rate we have not yet assumed jurisdiction if we have it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. When this bill was originally drafted by the committee we made its provisions broad and covered in scope every kind of bank, but in the hearings——

Mr. CULLOP. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] said it was never intended to cover such a case as I am putting to the gentleman from Arkansas, and if there is, I want to know it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. As finally prepared, it was not intended to cover that. If the gentleman will read the first bills he will see that they contain a sweeping prohibition of interlocking directorates, but in the hearings we found that there were so many conditions that existed throughout the country that were perfectly harmless that we made many exceptions. We put in a limitation prohibiting common directors where either of the national banks has a capital, surplus, and undivided profits of $2,500,000. In that case they are prohibited from having common directors, although one may be the smallest kind of a national bank.

But when it comes to the question of a State bank, the limitation is $2,500,000. That disqualifies the private banker or State bank director from being a director of a national bank or national banking association outside of cities of 100,000 inhabitants.

Mr. CULLOP. Let me put this proposition: As I understand it, a director of a national bank, with its deposits and capital stock and undivided profits of $2,500,000, can be director in a State or private bank organized in the same locality, provided its capital stock, profits, and undivided deposits amount to less than $2,500,000?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If he is not within a city exceeding 100,000 inhabitants.

Mr. CULLOP. I want to call the gentleman's attention to provision on page 29:

No banking association or trust company—

No bank, banking association, or trust company organized or operating under the laws of the United States in any city or incorporated town or village of more than 100,000 inhabitants, as shown by the last preceding decennial census of the United States, shall have as a director or other officer or employee any private banker or any director or other officer or employee of any other bank, banking association, or trust company located in the same place.

Now, if the gentleman will observe, the rest of that section down to the word "bank," in line 23, is one continuous sentence, so that this provision as to $2,500,000 and the director in one bank being a director in another is applied only in cases where the bank with its $2,500,000 is located in a city of more than 100,000 inhabitants.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. CULLOP. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know if there is any limitation on debate?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not understand the gentleman's position to be correct.

Mr. CULLOP. It must be in a city of more than 100,000 inhabitants.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. CARLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman that we dispose of the pending amendment and then take this question up and discuss it.

Mr. CULLOP. That is what this amendment is.

Mr. SABATH. The amendment applies to this very provision.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit me, I will explain the two provisions. If the two banks are in a city exceeding 100,000 inhabitants, then I understand that there can be no common directors, regardless of capital. The limitation of $2,500,000 does not apply in a city. It simply prohibits in cities exceeding 100,000 inhabitants there being common directors in national banks or banks operating under the laws of the United States, like those State banks which took advantage of the late act, without regard to capitalization or without regard to the amount of capital, surplus, and undivided profits. In all other cases the rule is that $2,500,000 capital, surplus, and undivided profits applies throughout the country.

Mr. SABATH. You do make exception in this provision, and you mean that it shall apply to only cities having a population over 100,000.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No; that is not it. That inhibition is that there shall not be common directors at all, without regard to the limitation, in cities of 100,000 population.

Mr. FARR. What was the theory of the committee in discriminating against cities of that size?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. On the theory that the banking interest is generally centered in cities. We had complaints before our committee, especially in the larger cities, that men who offered perfectly good security were, on account of the chain of banks having common directors, say, in a dozen different banks—a man perfectly responsible, with good security, would make application for a loan, and be refused by one bank, and then would be refused in turn by every other bank in the city, through the influence of that common director.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I am not quite clear as to lines 14 to 19, on page 29. Where it says the entire capital stock, that does not mean necessarily joint ownership of all the stocks in both banks? For instance, if you have two banks, one a State and one a national, with a million dollars capital, and one has 20 stockholders and one 10 stockholders, if five of the latter own all the stock of the former, that is enough to get the two banks within these provisions, is it not?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Suppose, under these conditions, 10 men in a national bank own all the stock of a trust company, and there are common officers and directors in both banks. Suppose 1 of the 10 men sells his stock, does it follow that immediately the directors have to resign their positions and the officers have to get out? Is there any provision in the bill to prevent such a hasty change?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I am glad that the gentleman from Massachusetts has asked that question. We realize the importance of so wording the statute that a director might not be put in the attitude of being eligible one day and a criminal the next. So we provide that where the disqualification is based on capitalization, surplus, and undivided profit, you shall take the average for the preceding year, and that when he is eligible at the time of his election, his eligibility continues throughout the year.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; but this is not in the capitalization, surplus, and undivided profit section. This is in a different paragraph. It is the stock and not the amount of the capitalization that applies on page 29.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that if that is not covered in the exceptions it ought to be.

Mr. PHELAN. I just mentioned it because I do not see it, and I thought possibly I might have missed it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The gentleman will realize the difficulty in providing a definite rule making it a criminal offense for a man to act as a director under the conditions described here. We fix it so that if he is eligible at the time of his election his eligibility continues for a year, although the condition of his bank might change or the capitalization be increased so that he would be ineligible under the terms of the provision and also in regard to the other provision, as to population, we make similar exceptions and provide that if eligible when elected his eligibility continues for a year; but if the particular point raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts is not covered it certainly ought to be, and we ought to make it clear.

Mr. PHELAN. My impression is that it is not covered in this particular place.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I am glad the gentleman has called our attention to that, because the theory upon which we are proceeding is to provide that if the director is eligible under this law at the time of his election, no matter what happened in the meantime, he shall be eligible for a year, the usual period for which bank directors are elected.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes. I am inclined to think that we overlooked that particular provision, and I desire to say frankly to the gentleman from Massachusetts that if we have it is important that an amendment should be offered to cure that defect.

Mr. PHELAN. I can offer that amendment later, can I not?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to continue for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be permitted to continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask for some information from either the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] or the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. Is there anything in this section that reaches this proposition? Let us say there is a national banking association in Kansas City that owns and controls 45 banks in the States of Oklahoma and Arkansas, and there is one man who is a common director in them all. Is there anything in this that will prohibit that?

Mr. CARLIN. Oh, yes; if the capital of any one of them exceeds two and a half million dollars or if the bank be situated in a city of 100,000 inhabitants or more. If the capital is smaller or the population smaller it does not prohibit it.

Mr. WINGO. Suppose there is a private banker in Missouri who owns a controlling interest and is a common director in a great many small banks scattered through those different States. Does it reach that condition?

Mr. CARLIN. It does not reach any number of small banks unless the capital of some one of them, surplus and deposits, should amount to two and one-half millions of dollars, or unless the bank should be situated in a city of 100,000 inhabitants.

Mr. WINGO. Suppose it is a national banking association that has a capital of two and a half million dollars. In other words, take a banking association that comes within the prohibited class in Kansas City. Is there anything to prohibit it from owning and controlling through a joint director 45 State banks in Oklahoma and Arkansas?

Mr. CARLIN. The bank itself?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. No. This bill does not deal with combinations relating to bank stocks.

Mr. WINGO. I say controlled through a common director.

Mr. CARLIN. They can not have a common director if at any time the capital, surplus, and deposits reach the sum of two and a half millions. He could not be a director in any other bank.

Mr. WINGO. That is a director in banks organized under the laws of the United States.

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; or those that are not. Of course, we can only reach State banks as they are related to national banks.

Mr. WINGO. It is provided on page 28 of the bill that no person shall be at the same time a director in more than one bank organized under the laws of the United States which shall have a capital of more than two and a half millions. There is nothing to prohibit that person from being a director in a national banking association having two and a half million dollars and at the same time being a director in 45 State banks in other States, is there? He can still be a director in a national bank of two and a half millions, and you do not prohibit——

Mr. CARLIN. If he is a director in a bank of two and a half millions surplus capital and undivided profits, he is prohibited from being a director in any other bank.

Mr. WINGO. Not in any other bank, but in any other United States bank.

Mr. CARLIN. In any national bank.

Mr. WINGO. But does it prohibit him from being a director in 45 State banks?

Mr. CARLIN. I think it does; yes.

Mr. WINGO. If they are State banks they are not organized under the laws of the United States.

Mr. CARLIN. We have authorized him to be a director in one State bank and under only one condition, and that is where a common stock ownership exists in the same party.

Mr. WINGO. I would like for the gentleman to point out in this section where you prohibit a man from being a director in a national bank of two and a half million capital and at the same time a director in a private or a State bank, however great their number may be.

Mr. CARLIN. We had that question up a moment ago.

Mr. CULLOP. And we settled it just against what the gentleman decided now.

Mr. CARLIN. No; we did not.

Mr. CULLOP. Exactly.

Mr. PETERSON. If the gentleman will see the beginning of section 9, it says:

> That from and after two years from the date of approval of this act no person at the same time shall be a director or other officer or employee in more than one bank.

Mr. WINGO. What kind of a bank? A bank organized and operated under the laws of the United States.

Mr. PETERSON. Any kind of a bank.

Mr. WINGO. But more than one bank or association or trust company can operate under the laws of the United States. In other words, that inhibition goes to the national bank directors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. That is as far as we can carry it.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Arkansas. I think I understand this proposition just as the gentleman does, and that is if he means one director, a man may be a director in a bank of $2,500,000. capital, surplus, and deposits combined, organized under the laws of the United States, but he can not be a director in any other bank organized under the laws of the United States, but there is nothing to prohibit him from being a director in a State or private bank in this bill.

Mr. WINGO. There is nothing to prohibit, but I want to get the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana on this. As I understand, there is nothing to prohibit a Missouri preacher who happens to be a director in a Kansas City national bank also from being a director and having dominating control in 45 banks in Oklahoma and Arkansas.

Mr. CULLOP. Nothing, unless he has not the capital to own the stock.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is only true where banks have less than $2,500,000 capital.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. That is the limit placed on it.

Mr. CULLOP. But a man can be a director in a national bank with a stock of $2,500,000 capital, deposits, and surplus and there is nothing to prohibit him from being a director in a State bank or private bank or in numerous banking concerns providing their capital does not run above $2,500,000.

Mr FLOYD of Arkansas. That is what I explained to the gentleman from Indiana before.

Mr. CULLOP. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] was combating that proposition just a moment ago, and hence I raised the question again.

Mr. CARLIN. It was a misunderstanding, if that is the case. I tried to make it plain that the capital had to be $2,500,000.

Mr. CULLOP. But the gentleman did not state that, and that is why I called attention to the fact again.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to answer further the gentleman from Massachusetts in regard to that exception?

Mr. CULLOP. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think that the case referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts is covered in lines 15, 16, and 17.

Mr. CULLOP. What page?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Page 30.

The eligibility of a director under the foregoing provision shall be determined by the aggregate amount of the capital, surplus, and undivided profits, exclusive of dividends declared but not paid to stockholders, at the end of the fiscal year of said corporation next preceeding the election of directors, and when a director has been elected in accordance with the provisions of this act it shall be lawful for him to continue as such for one year thereafter.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a minute?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. I am not certain whether that covers it or not.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It refers to that act.

Mr. PHELAN. Whether or not it does with reference to the director, it does as to an officer or employee; but those are the words used on line 16 on page 29—"director or other officer or employee."

Mr CULLOP. That refers to some other corporation than a bank. That does not apply to a bank. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] will observe, commencing on line 24 of page 29, the language is—

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person at the same time shall be a director in any two or more corporations, either of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, engaged in whole or in part in commerce.

This has no reference to the banking business, but to other affairs.

Mr. CARLIN. That relates to industrial commerce.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes. That does not relate to banking. That relates to industrial and commercial corporations, or institutions of that kind, but has no reference whatever to the banking business.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana that on page 29, in reference to the banking section, the same language is repeated again on line 1 of page 29:

And when a director has been elected in accordance with the provisions of this act it shall be lawful for him to continue as such for one year thereafter under said election.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; but that refers back to the qualification on page 28 of the $2,500,000 capital, deposits, and surplus.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think not. It says "in accordance with the provisions of this act." I think that is broad enough to cover it. He is eligible when he is elected. That is on lines 1, 2, and 3 of page 29.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] has expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to repeat that if this provision is not clear in this respect we would be glad to have an amendment offered to clarify it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, let us have this reported again. It has been some time since it was reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLINE:

Page 29, line 18, strike out the words "the entire," at the end of the line, and insert the words "not less than three-fourths of the," so that the lines as amended will read: "more than one other bank or trust company organized under the laws of the United States or any State where not less than three-fourths of the capital stock of one is owned by stockholders in the other," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows.

Strike out, on page 28, lines 8 to 25, inclusive, and on page 29, lines 1 to 23, inclusive, and insert in place thereof the following:

"Whenever an officer or director of a bank or trust company, member of a Federal reserve bank, shall be also a private banker, or an officer or director of any other bank or trust company, and it shall appear to the Federal Reserve Board upon proof, after due notice of hearing and an opportunity to be heard, that such officer or director is taking advantage of his position so as substantially to lessen competition between such banks or trust companies or any of them, or between himself and any such bank or trust company, or that he is exercising improper influence over any such bank or trust company in the granting or refusing of credit, the Federal Reserve Board shall remove such officer or director from one or all of said banks organized under the laws of the United States and may require the removal of such officer or director from such State bank or trust company, or in the alternative the retirement of such State bank or trust company from membership in said Federal reserve bank."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Why not limit debate on the section?

Mr. WEBB. I would be very glad to do that.

Mr. MANN. Let us see who has an amendment on the section.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] is not adopted, I have an amendment that I should like to offer for myself.

Mr. WEBB. Would the gentleman like to have five minutes to discuss it?

Mr. GARDNER. It is on the same line as that of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. WEBB. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Well, we want a little more time than that.

Mr. WEBB. I will give the gentleman all he wants.

Mr. MANN. We will take 15 minutes on this side.

Mr. WEBB. Thirty minutes, then, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I shall not object, but I desire to offer an amendment on page 30, line 21, to put in the words "not exceeding" just before the words "$100 a day." I do not care to discuss it. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes, one half of the time to be controlled by himself, and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered strikes out of the section in regard to interlocking bank directorates that part which controls and limits them by the amount of $2,500,000 in the one instance and by the population of the town in which the banks are situated in the other instance, and proposes to substitute for that a provision establishing two principles which it is believed should be followed in banking; and then it provides that if either of those principles be violated, on complaint of the violation being made to the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Reserve Board, after a hearing, shall act.

Now, I introduced as drastic an interlocking directorate bill affecting banks as could possibly be imagined. That was before we had the hearings. But after the hearings I was satisfied that in order to remedy some admitted evils, of which I complained as much as anybody, and which exist principally in some of the large cities, we might easily go too far and hit a great many people who are directors in banks and who are entirely innocent of any attempt to do the sort of thing complained of. The complaints when boiled down were in substance that on the one hand banks suppress competition and on the other hand that they unfairly discriminate in making loans. Now, this amendment provides, in substance, that there must be competition, and that there must be no unfair discrimination in making loans. Then it provides, as I said before, that on complaint of the violation of either of those two general principles, the Federal Reserve Board shall remove the officer or director complained of from one or all of said banks organized under the laws of the United States; that is as far as we have power to go directly in the way of removal, and the proposed amendment provides that they may require the removal of such officer or director from such State bank or trust company, or the withdrawal of the bank or trust company from the Federal reserve bank. In other words they might say, "You must get out of the State bank or trust company," and failing that, in the alternative, might require the retirement of a State bank or trust company from membership in the Federal reserve bank.

Now, why does not that entirely take care of this whole situation? If the abuse exists, here is the power to remedy the abuse; but by making these artificial limitations—because they are purely artificial limitations—of $2,500,000 of capital, surplus, deposits, and undivided profits in the one instance, and of 100,000 population in the other, while we may remedy some of the evils, we are pretty certain to injure unnecessarily a great many people of the kind of whom no complaint has been made.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOY. Certainly.

Mr. BARTON. Under your amendment who makes the complaint?

Mr. McCOY. Anybody can make the complaint. It does not limit it to any particular person. Presumably it will be the person who has been injured.

As I say, from all over the country we have encountered, or have been informed in the testimony, of situations such as exist in and about Chicago, New York, St. Louis, San Francisco, and other places, and, moreover, in other parts of the country where they have no very large cities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr VOLSTEAD. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is a sane and sensible proposition. This amendment seeks to cure an evil and not to stop the ordinary course of business. It seems to me it is a remedy for the trust evils of which we complain. The alternative is that those men who invest in bank stocks and who under this bill would be ineligible for directors would naturally put in dummies to act as directors for them. It is very much better that capable and able business men, who have a knowledge of credit, who have a knowledge of business, should act as directors of banks than that they, having invested in bank stocks, should put in dummies to represent them. No one could be more opposed than I am to the limitation of credit and the unfair practices that have debauched the commercial world; but I, of my own knowledge, know that men of capital who invest in bank stocks are naturally anxious to watch those investments and would not take the responsibility of banking shown in the double liability of national-bank stock unless they knew what was going on in the banks in which they were interested.

If at any time these directors, by collusion, by unfair practices, by blacklisting, refusal of credit, or combination, should do things that are contrary to the public welfare, under this amendment they can be disassociated from protection or control of their investments. But as things are to-day, to provide that men must be limited in their directorship in corporations in which they are interested, not on the ground of evil they may do by combinations contrary to law and to public policy, but merely on account of the fact of their caring for their investments, it seems to me that such a course must lead necessarily to the incompetence born of dummy directors and consequent chaos in business organization. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] on the ground that he proposes to change the whole theory of this bill and to interject into the provisions of it a new and untried experiment, and to legislate the power to deal with bank directors to the Federal Reserve Board, which, perhaps, in the course of a very short time, will need regulating as badly as do the directors of banks now. That is his proposition.

Now, I believe in dealing with corporations as you would deal with individuals. This is a criminal statute and I believe in a criminal statute we should say to corporations and to persons acting as agents of corporations what they can do, and give them the widest latitude to do things not prohibited in the law; we should put them on notice of what is prohibited by statute, but when you adopt a system of creating boards and letting the board exercise favoritism on the one hand and their prejudices on the other, then indeed we will enter on an era of dissatisfaction, strife, and discontent in this country that will disturb the business interests of the entire country.

We believe in regulating and controlling, but not in disturbing, legitimate business. We believe that great evils have grown out of interlocking directorates, and everybody recognizes that condition who has given the subject any consideration.

The gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] says that it will only create dummy directors. What have we now? We have one great and powerful director, say, of a railroad company, director of the holding company, director of all the affiliated corporations owned by the railroad company and by the holding company, and who are the other directors? They select some employee of that company and of the affiliated companies, give him one share of stock, make him sign up a transfer to them in blank, and then appoint him a director. Is he not a dummy director, pure and simple? We desire to prevent this evil; we desire to do it in an intelligent and sensible way. We desire to put all men upon notice, so that they will know when they are violating the law and when they are not.

It has been argued that certain men are alone capable of carrying on the business of a great concern. What an absurdity. There is one phase of this legislation that has been overlooked largely. It was mentioned by the President, and that is the opportunities that will be offered by this legislation to thousands of young men now shut off from business opportunity and who are now mere hirelings. They are not getting a fair chance in the business world. It will open up a thousand avenues for them. Where we now have 1 man a director of 50 corporations we will have 50 capable men occuping places of importance in the business world, places of responsibility, and the result will be good to the business interests of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will yield five minutes, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, the trouble with the majority is that they do not wish to injure any legitimate business, but nevertheless they do injure legitimate business. I have in mind an instance in my own district, and I have no doubt that similar instances could be found in every other district which is suburban to Boston. In the city of Salem in the Merchants Bank we have a director who is also a director in the Liberty Trust Co. in Boston, a large concern. He remains a director in the Merchants Bank of Salem out of local pride, greatly to the benefit of the community. There is no connection on earth between the Liberty Trust Co. in Boston and the Merchants Bank in Salem, and yet because the Liberty Trust Co. has over two and a half millions in assets and deposits, this bill says that we must deprive Salem of this director's services. I have no doubt the same situation exists in the district represented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MITCHELL]. I have no doubt that the same situation exists in every district suburban to Boston. We are depriving the national banks in those suburban districts of the services of men who are actuated solely by public spirit. I prefer the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] to the amendment which I shall offer myself if his amendment is rejected. The McCoy amendment bears no relation to what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] has been saying. The gentleman has been talking about individuals who serve on 50 directorates.

Certain men may perhaps serve on a great number of miscellaneous directorates, but there is no man on earth who serves on the boards of 50 national banks or trust companies. The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey says this: Let us permit a man to serve on two or more national banks or trust companies, no matter what their size may be; but if he does wrong when so serving, then the Federal Reserve Board is to have him removed from his position and he will not be permitted to serve any longer. I consider that the gentleman from New Jersey has proposed a very liberal and proper amendment. My amendment, which I shall offer if his is defeated, is not so liberal. My amendment provides that the Federal Reserve Board may issue a revocable permit allowing a man to serve on the board of directors of two banking institutions, no matter what their size.

The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey is just. If, however, you gentlemen are unwilling to agree that a man shall be permitted to serve in two large banking institutions until removed for misconduct, perhaps you will consent to my amendment. The gentleman from New Jersey proposes to allow service on two large boards, unless forbidden by the Federal Reserve Board. I propose to allow service on two large boards if specially permitted by the Federal Reserve Board. You gentlemen who come from country districts ought not to deprive us who live near large cities of the best banking talent we can find—so far, of course, as is consistent with the public welfare.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

ACTION OF TENESSEE BANKERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk resolutions unanimously adopted by the Bankers' Association of Tennessee at their annual meeting held at Chattanooga on the 29th day of May. This association is composed of the National, State, and private bankers of that State, and its membership I should think politically is at least two-thirds Democratic.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read:

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Congress has now been in session almost continuously for more than a year; and

Whereas during that time a great amount of legislation has been passed, the entire tariff revised, the entire currency system of the United States has undergone a complete and fundamental change; and

Whereas it will take much time for the banking interests to adjust themselves to these new laws; and

Whereas there are now pending before Congress numerous bills which, if passed, will undertake the regulation of all business institutions with which banks are constantly doing business, and not only will banks be undergoing, as they are undergoing, a complete change of methods, but the business with which they are constantly in contact will themselves be undergoing a complete change: Be it

Resolved, That we believe that the country is sorely in need of a period of legislative rest while the business of the country is readjusting itself to the new currency and banking bill, and that we consider the passage of any great amount of new legislation by Congress at this time to be unhelpful to the general welfare of the country, and we believe the passage of such legislation will rather tend to further stagnate business than to stimulate it: Be it further

Resolved, That the secretary be hereby directed to forward to our Congressmen and our Senators a copy of this resolution.

DANIEL WEBSTER'S VIEWS.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the discussion we have had to-night, participated in by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], I wish to read an extract from a speech made by Daniel Webster 81 years ago in the Senate of the United States in reference to banks, corporations, and monopoly. This is taken from a speech by Mr. Webster in the Senate in 1833 and has a bearing on the pending measure:

There are persons who constantly clamor. They complain of oppression, speculation, and pernicious influence of accumulated wealth. They cry out loudly against all banks and corporations and all means by which small capitalists become united in order to produce important and beneficial results. They carry on mad hostility against all established institutions. They would choke the fountain of industry and dry all streams. In a country of unbounded liberty they clamor against oppression. In a country of perfect equality they would move heaven and earth against privilege and monopoly. In a country where property is more evenly divided than anywhere else they rend the air shouting against agrarian doctrines. In a country where wages of labor are high beyond parallel they would teach the laborer that he is but an oppressed slave.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HOUSTON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 15190. An act to amend section 103 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as amended by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1913.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey. We feel that it would make this important provision in the bill practically useless. It is well known that the influences of interlocking directorates are such that you can not place your hand upon the sore spot, you can not place your hand upon the source where the damage to a business man is done. If you transfer the right to the Federal Reserve Board to discover where the wrong is done, you might as well throw it away, for in my opinion the reserve board would not find it. These influences are so subtle that a ferret could not find where a man was hurt. Complaint has been made about a string of banks in Boston before our committee. There are three or four different banks there in which directors were common in them all. A business man or two would apply to one of these banks for a loan. Nothing doing. He would then apply to another bank for a loan, and another bank, and finally he is shut out entirely. Now, the reserve board could not tell who did that, where the information came from, so the committee thought it better to make a hard and fast rule in order that no man could serve on these boards as an interlocking director, rather than transfer it to the board, which might never, or certainly would hardly ever, find the source of injury or wrong, and we think therefore it is better to adhere to the rule laid down in the bill, and I hope the committee will do so.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Simply for a question.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] repeatedly said that under the pending amendment the reserve board would have the right to remove directors caught in wrongdoing, or words to that effect. Is there anything in the present law that would prevent the removal of directors under such conditions?

Mr. CARLIN. Nothing; any director caught in wrongdoing can be removed now. A clause in the banking and currency bill provides it.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield to me; can I have the attention of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. CARLIN. Certainly; excuse me; the gentleman behind was calling my attention to something.

Mr. GARDNER. Can any director be removed to-day for any action which will lessen the competition between two banks in both of which he is a director?

Mr. CARLIN. Not for lessening competition; of course not.

Mr. GARDNER. That is the point of the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey about which the gentleman from Indiana asked.

Mr. CARLIN. The difficulty with the gentleman from Boston is this——

Mr. GARDNER. I am not from Boston.

Mr. CARLIN. With the gentleman from Massachusetts is this: We are endeavoring to drive at a system, whereas this amendment undertakes to deal with individuals and specific cases.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is driving at a system with which the gentleman has no experience in that part of the country from which the gentleman comes.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman is very much mistaken. I expect I have had as much experience if not more than the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. Well, perhaps.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote, if discussion is ended.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, line 21, after the word "of" when it occurs the first time in the line, insert the words "not exceeding."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, has all debate been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has three minutes remaining.

Mr. WEBB. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the bill as it is now presented makes a flat fine of $100 a day, irrespective, and gives the court no discretion in the matter. The amendment I offer is simply to make it not exceeding $100 a day. There may be cases where the court would like not to impose the largest penalty, and this amendment simply gives the court some discretion in the matter so as to adjust the penalty to the case.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the committee sees no objection to the amendment. We think it is a fair one.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Page 29, line 3, after the word 'election,' insert 'Provided, That the Federal Reserve Board may grant to any person a revocable permission to serve at the same time as a director or other officer or employee of an additional bank, banking association, or trust company, notwithstanding anything contained in this paragraph, whenever it is satisfied that such permission may be granted without detriment to the public welfare and without the creation of monopoly or restraint of trade: Provided further, That in his annual report the Secretary of the Treasury shall specify each permission granted in accordance with the preceding proviso together with the reasons therefor.'"

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, of course the committee is opposed to that amendment because it changes the whole principle of the interlocking-directorates section of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I would like the Clerk to report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 29, lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "one hundred thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two hundred thousand."

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss this amendment further than to say——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman time?

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. I had an arrangement made with the chairman to offer an amendment.

Mr. WEBB. If my time is not exhausted, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has two and one-half minutes remaining.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman one minute, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. All I desire to say or can say in the minute allowed me is that the frenzied financiering and unfair control by interlocking directorates that this bill seeks to rectify do not apply to cities of 100,000 or 200,000 inhabitants. In the banking business of New Haven, Bridgeport, Worcester, Fall River, and other New England cities there is no interlocking directors' evil and no need of this legislation. It looks as if the other cities of the country were being punished for the offenses of one or two great money centers and a few money kings. The limit should be raised to cities of at least 200,000, and might safely go beyond that figure.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman three minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not in sympathy with the section, and, having said that much about the section, I would like to ask a question in reference to what it means. Section 9 provides—

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person who is engaged as an individual—

Now what? Then it proceeds:

Or who is a member of a partnership.

Now, if the gentleman can find anything that follows that that it relates to, I will be willing to give him a new suit of clothes. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNHART. It would not relate to it if it would follow it.

Mr. MANN. I yield, Mr. Chairman, to know what that refers to, if anybody can tell me. All the language that follows it relates to a corporation. I suppose that the mere fact that an individual is "engaged" is not intended to prevent him from being an officer or director or employee of a corporation.

Mr. CARLIN. That section is intended to apply to the individual.

Mr. MANN. I know. I am not asking what the section applies to, but what this language applies to:

No person who is engaged as an individual.

What?

Mr. CARLIN. An individual engaged in producing or selling equipment.

Mr. MANN. That is not what the bill says. The bill says:

No person who is engaged as an individual, or who is a member of a partnership, or is a director or other officer of a corporation that is engaged in the business, in whole or in part, of producing or selling equipment—

And so forth.

All the language about equipment is related to and a part of the definition of "a corporation," and there is no language in the paragraph that relates to an individual or a partnership except that under the language a man that is "engaged," or a man who is a member of a partnership, can not become a director or other officer or employee of a corporation. Of course I do not expect the gentleman to correct it now, but, as a matter of credit to even the Democratic side of the House. I hope the gentleman will study grammar enough and rhetoric enough to make that language mean sense. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARLIN. I think the gentleman needs to become a student, and not the gentlemen on this side.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman can say that, but the gentleman can not answer the question.

Mr. CARLIN. I think the language is perfectly correct. That answers the question.

Mr. MANN. If you should leave that in the bill, and any school teacher looked at it, you would be forever discredited. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARLIN. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. This is a section that should be amended to conform to the previous amendment about jurisdiction and service. I suppose the committee wants to offer an amendment, does it not?

Mr. WEBB. I believe the amendment we agreed to before, Mr. Chairman, was that after the word "found" we would insert the words "or has an agent."

Mr. CULLOP. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to suggest that there be incorporated in the amendment further the language "and wherever the cause of action accrues." That applies to bringing a suit; that any suit or action against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or has an agent, and it ought to go further, and I think that was the agreement, and provide "or where the cause of action arises."

Mr. CARLIN. How will you get service there?

Mr. CULLOP. There is where it has an agency.

Mr. CARLIN. If you sue them where they have an agency, it does not make any difference where the cause of action arises. You would not help the bill any by adding what you suggest. I think if you include the words "or has an agent" you have got the whole thing.

Mr. CULLOP. If the committee are satisfied with that, I will not press the suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina offer an amendment?

Mr. WEBB. The amendment which I suggested, after the word "found," in line 4, on page 31, to add the words "or has an agent."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 4, after the word "found," insert the words "or has an agent."

Mr. WEBB. And strike out the period, and insert a comma after the word "found."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making a suggestion to the committee, and if necessary, of offering an amendment.

It seems to me very clear that when the bill comes to provide for the venue, it ought to add the words "where the cause of action or any part thereof arises."

That fixes the venue, and does not make the plaintiff depend upon the place where he may be able to find an agent.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment if I may, and offer this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn; and the gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 4, strike out the period at the end of the paragraph, insert a comma, and add the following: "or where the cause of action or any part thereof arises."

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman offer it to come in after the amendment just agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS. I meant to ask unanimous consent that it come in after the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be modified in the way indicated by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee. I am certain that this amendment ought to be adopted. There is no reason on earth why it should not be adopted. This amendment provides that suit may be instituted where the cause of action or any part thereof accrues. Now, why should it not be adopted? If a man suffers an injury in a given locality, why not bring the suit there?

Mr. WEBB. The bill provides that you can sue the corporation wherever it may be found, or wherever it has an agent, or wherever it resides. Now, how could you get service on a corporation unless it be found in a locality or unless it has an agent there?

Mr. SUMNERS. May I ask the gentleman a question before answering his? Has the gentleman any objection to permitting a man to bring suit at the place where he suffers the injury?

Mr. WEBB. You may not be able to find anyone to serve process upon.

Mr. SUMNERS. We can provide for the service of process later. The service of process is governed entirely by the laws which Congress may enact; and if it is necessary to have subsequent legislation in order to regulate the matter of service of process that is no reason why the suit should not be brought at the place where the cause of action arises.

Mr. WEBB. You might authorize suit against the property of the corporation, but you could not get personal service on the corporation unless it had an agent there, or was found there, or resided there.

Mr. SUMNERS. Unless Congress authorized service beyond the district, and we can do that.

Mr. WEBB. How can you get service of process?

Mr. SUMNERS. By sending your process to an officer of the Federal Government at the place where the corporation has its residence or an agency.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman's amendment does not provide for that.

Mr. SUMNERS. I know it does not; but there is no reason why that amendment could not be added. I will offer that amendment if it ought to be there. If you adopt this amendment, that does not interfere with the right of service of process, just the same as you have it under this bill. Suppose a corporation or individual goes into a certain locality and there inflicts an injury, and then withdraws its agent from that territory. Do you mean to tell me that this committee is in favor of driving the man who suffered the injury to a foreign jurisdiction to get his remedy? There is nothing fair or just about it, and I am sure that the committee do not intend to do that. I merely want to call your attention to it, and I hope the committee will agree to it. It does not weaken your bill by just adding that much more to it, and it gives the poor man who has suffered the injury that much additional opportunity to bring suit at or near his home. It can not hurt your bill.

Mr. WEBB. We have already broadened the provisions of the Sherman Act with reference to the bringing of suit and the service of process at any place where the corporation is an inhabitant, or wherever it is found, or wherever it has an agent. I can hardly conceive of a suit being brought otherwise than under these conditions, and it makes service by process easy, and therefore we oppose the amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. The language of the bill is as amended "wherever it may be found," and the amendment is "or has an agent." What do you mean by the language "wherever it may be found"?

Mr. WEBB. Wherever it has an agent. The circuit court of appeals has so decided.

Mr. FOWLER. The antecedent of "it" is "corporation." Where may a corporation be found?

Mr. WEBB. Wherever it has an agent, and practically every State in the Union requires, before a corporation is allowed to do business within the borders of the State, that it must have an agent upon whom process can be served.

Mr. FOWLER. That is true, and that is the reason of my asking the question. This is a Federal proceeding and ought not you to enumerate the officers on whom service may be had? Ought you not to say the president, the vice president, any director, or any agent of the corporation, so that it would mean something? "It" stands for corporation in the language you have used.

Mr. WEBB. I am not sure, but I think there is a provision in the Federal law which allows you to serve the president, vice president, director, or agent of a corporation.

Mr FOWLER. The gentleman means that the plaintiff is permitted to get service on the corporation by serving the president, vice president, director, or an agent?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. I am not sure, and I want information on that.

Mr. KONOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KONOP. I would like to ask a question. You say wherever it may be found or has an agent. Suppose a violator of the antitrust law is an individual? Would you refer to him as "it"?

Mr. WEBB. This refers to corporations who commit actions in restraint of trade.

Mr. CARLIN. This is in relation to suits against corporations.

Mr. FOWLER. The antecedent of "it" is "corporation." The only point I wanted to raise is as to the person on whom service would be had. My opinion is that the persons ought to be enumerated if they are not definitely enumerated in some Federal statute.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the language he is discussing is found in section 7 of the Sherman antitrust law, where it says "in which the defendant resides or is found." There has never been any difficulty about service in regard to those words, and the gentleman from Illinois desires to put a limitation upon that language which would lessen it and narrow it. When you mention specific officers, agents, or individuals upon whom service may be had, like the president, vice president, and director, and so forth, you narrow the scope of the provision. The corporation is found wherever it is transacting business and has any kind of an agent.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, you must have some person definite on whom to get service before you can get a corporation into court. The gentleman from Arkansas is too good a lawyer not to know all that.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. But when you say agent it includes every kind of an agent.

Mr. FOWLER. There is a difference between an officer of a corporation and the agent of a corporation.

Mr. DAVENPORT. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield——

Mr. FOWLER. I will yield.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I have had occasion within the last few weeks to look up the Federal statutes in regard to the service of corporations. There is a statute that provides in substance that a suit against a corporation may be served on the president, vice president, or agent, or any officer of the corporation.

Mr. FOWLER. That is exactly the point I am raising. If there is a Federal statute providing that service shall be made upon representatives of a corporation in order to get it into court, I presume that this language is sufficient.

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is a fact, because I looked it up within two weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That whenever a corporation shall be guilty of the violation of any of the provisions of the antitrust laws the offense shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation; and upon the conviction of the corporation any director, officer, or agent who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of such prohibited acts shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction therefor shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking information of the chairman of the committee. Section 12 as it appears before us now is radically different from the section in the original bill. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what the thought of the committee was in lines 12 and 13. The language is "the offense shall be deemed to be also that of the individual director, officers, or agents of such corporation." Was it the thought of the committee that each director of a corporation guilty of this offense should also be deemed personally guilty?

Mr. WEBB. As far as we are concerned, it would be read, in connection with line 13, after the semicolon, "and upon the conviction of the corporation any director, officer, or agent who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any such prohibited acts shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," and so forth. I think it should be connected up with that provision.

I do not think that the officer of the corporation could be convicted unless you picked out the officer who had done the prohibited thing, and that is explained in lines 13 to 15, inclusive.

Mr. LENROOT. It ought to be so, but it certainly does not read so on its face. It would be open to construction and the construction seems to me to be uncertain.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. What suggestion has the gentleman to make?

Mr. LENROOT. The original section read in this way:

Shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, and agents of such corporation authorizing, ordering, or doing any of such prohibition acts.

It limited the guilt to those actually responsible for the acts violative of the law. I am not offering an amendment, because I also want to raise another question.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. While the gentleman is on that point, if he will notice the draft of the original provision he will find that it is connected with the preceding clause; but the committee, in order to make it clear that the conviction of the corporation did not of itself constitute the director's guilt, changed it so as to read:

And upon the conviction of the corporation any director, officer, or agent who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of such prohibited acts shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor—

And so forth.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the gentleman if in seeking to avoid one difficulty he has not gotten into another?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If we did, we would be very glad to have any suggestion from the gentleman.

Mr. LENROOT. I am not entirely clear myself. I am asking for information.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The purpose we had was to make it clear that, when a corporation had been guilty, those officers, agents, and directors of the corporation that either authorized, ordered, or did the thing prohibited should be guilty. Under the existing law, and without that provision of the statute, the person who did the things would undoubtedly be guilty; but in the enforcement of the criminal provisions of the Sherman law, experience has demonstrated that both juries and courts are slow to convict men who have simply done acts authorized or ordered by some officers of the concern higher up, and the words "authorized" and "ordered" were introduced to reach the real offenders, the men who caused the things to be done; and if the language is susceptible of any ambiguity and is not clear, we desire to make it clear. I will state to the gentleman that we intended to give agents and officers a trial, and we do not mean that the guilt of the corporation shall attach to them without trial; but in order to obtain a conviction, it will be necessary for the Government to charge them specifically with authorizing, ordering, or doing of the thing prohibited, and, on proof, convict them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds, will he yield in order that I may ask a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under this language—and upon the conviction of the corporation, any director, officer, or agent who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of such prohibited acts shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor—would the corporation have to be convicted before any proceeding, information or otherwise, indictment, could be brought against the officers of the corporation for the offense?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not think so. It was not so intended.

Mr. MANN. Is not that what it says? The first part says:

That whenever a corporation shall be guilty of the violation of any of the provisions of the antitrust laws the offense shall also be deemed to be that of the individual directors—

And so forth.

How can you tell when the corporation is guilty until you have tried the corporation?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think the officers, directors, and agents might be guilty independently of the guilt of the corporation.

Mr. MANN. In the first part you have to find the corporation guilty before any of them can be convicted, and then you go on and say that upon conviction the others may be convicted.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the difficulty that the committee was in with reference to the original section to make it clear that merely upon conviction of the corporation the officers should not be convicted of the offense without trial, but in attempting to remedy that it seems to me the committee has gotten into another and even more serious difficulty. As suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the first section now reads that the corporation itself must first be convicted before they can proceed against the officers; but that is not the most serious thing, for I am afraid, as the section reads, it will be construed in this way: That when the corporation is convicted the question of violation of law becomes a settled fact, and the only issue that the officers are entitled to be heard upon in the action against them is the simple one as to whether or not they ordered or authorized the act to be done, and denying them the opportunity to be heard as to whether the act itself was in fact prohibited by the law; but they certainly must have the right to have that question determined as well as the fact as to whether or not the particular act was ordered or authorized by them.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. In other words, the gentleman from Wisconsin suggests that the language used might be interpreted to mean that the officers of the corporation would never be convicted unless the corporation was first convicted.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the way it reads.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to say it was not the intention of the committee to give it any such construction and to repeat that if an amendment can be suggested that will cure the apparent defect the committee will be glad to accept it. We intended to provide that when the corporation was convicted that the offense should be deemed also the offense of the officers and agents authorizing, ordering, or doing the prohibited thing, and then to provide that these individuals should not be convicted except upon indictment and trial as to the facts charged.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 12 and substitute:

"Any person who shall do, or cause to be done, or shall willingly suffer and permit to be done any act, matter, or thing prohibited or declared to be unlawful in the antitrust laws or shall aid or abet therein, shall be deemed guilty of such prohibited and unlawful acts, matters, and things and shall be subject to the punishments prescribed therefor in the trust laws."

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, we desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Section 12, as it reads, I think clearly requires that there must be first a conviction of the corporation before there is any guilt on the part of the officers, because it provides that upon conviction the officers doing certain things shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; consequently it is necessary to establish first the guilt of the corporation. I assume that the committee did not intend any such result as that, because instead of making the guilt personal it would make it——

Mr. METZ. If the gentleman will permit me there, we are trying in all of these sections to deal with the corporation, with the corporate form of doing business. The individual is not touched in any shape or manner. The moment he incorporates under the State law he becomes a corporation. Now, a great majority of the corporations of this country are not corporations in the sense that their stock is for sale, but it is a one-man concern and is under the control of one man with dummy directors, and if he——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I did not yield for a speech, but simply for a question.

Mr. METZ. My question is, How are you going to reach the one-man corporation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The amendment I have offered is practically a copy of a similar act that is applied to the railway corporations by the interstate-commerce act. It has this additional advantage over the one contained in the bill. It does not increase the punishment beyond the limit fixed in the various acts. Take, for instance, section 9. The punishment there is only $100, while the punishment provided in section 12 is $5,000.

Mr. WEBB. It is $100 a day in section 9.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. But you do not intend to change that item, you intend that the punishment shall be the same; that is, that the punishment of the individual shall be the same as the punishment of the corporation. Now, the amendment that I have offered——

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. I take it that we all agree that this section ought to be amended, and I ask unanimous consent to let this section go over until to-morrow and see if we can not draw up an amendment that will be acceptable to both sides.

Mr. TOWNER. I hope that will be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to that request?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Before leaving it, I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if this section might not be omitted altogether. I would like this question to be considered. The reason for that is this: Returning to page 20, you have defined there the word "person" to include also corporations. But that does not by any means mean that the word "person" always means a corporation. It means in the bill just as much as it ever did. It means a person, and if any person commits any of the acts that are prohibited by this act—that is, if his personal connection can be shown with any of those acts—will he not be deemed as a violator of the terms of this act?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. May I suggest to the gentleman that I think it is very essential that some prohibition of this kind should be made, because section 8, which deals with the question of stock consolidations, does not mention persons at all. It is simply a prohibition against corporations, and in order to prevent individuals from carrying out the consolidations prohibited in section 8 you will need that; otherwise you would have nothing at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that section 12 be passed over. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That no preliminary injunction shall be issued without notice to the opposite party.

No temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice to the opposite party unless it shall clearly appear from specific facts shown by affidavit or by the verified bill that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to property or a property right of the applicant before notice could be served or hearing had thereon. Every such temporary restraining order shall be indorsed with the date and hour of issuance, shall be forthwith filed in the clerk's office and entered of record, shall define the injury and state why it is irreparable and why the order was granted without notice, and shall by its terms expire within such time after entry, not to exceed 10 days, as the court or judge may fix. In case a temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice in the contingency specified, the matter of the issuance of a preliminary injunction shall be set down for a hearing at the earliest possible time and shall take precedence of all matters except older matters of the same character; and when the same comes up for hearing the party obtaining the temporary restraining order shall proceed with his application for a preliminary injunction, and if he does not do so the court shall dissolve his temporary restraining order. Upon two days' notice to the party obtaining such temporary restraining order the opposite party may appear and move the dissolution or modification of the order, and in that event the court or judge shall proceed to hear and determine the motion as expeditiously as the ends of justice may require.

Section 263 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, is hereby repealed.

Nothing in this section contained shall be deemed to alter, repeal, or amend section 266 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Mr. MacDONALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MacDONALD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MacDONALD. Mr. Chairman, beginning with the second paragraph on page 33, line 13, I move to strike out the remainder of the section and insert the language that I have sent to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 13, strike out the remainder of the section down to and including line 24, on page 34, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"In construing this act the right to enter into the relation of employer and employee, to change that relation and to assume and create a new relation of employer and employee, and to perform and carry on business in such relation with any person in any place or do work and labor as an employee shall be held and construed to be a personal and not a property right. In all cases involving the violation of the contract of employment by either the employee or employer where no irreparable damage is about to be committed upon the property or property right of either no injunction shall be granted, but the parties shall be left to their remedy at law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MacDONALD].

Mr. MacDONALD. Mr. Chairman, the second paragraph of section 15, as I read it, does nothing to change existing law in regard to injunctions or the issuance of injunctions, except one thing, and that one thing is that the language of the section, by implication, creates a new and distinct class of cases in which injunctions can issue with notice. The paragraph provides—

That no temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice to the opposite party—

And so forth; and in continuation states no further jurisdiction in such cases than now exists under the present practice, thereby, by implication, creating another class of injunctions that can be granted with notice; and I am constrained to believe that a court could hold, and probably would hold, that that might authorize courts to issue injunctions in cases of invasion of personal rights where they are not so authorized to do now. That has been a long-mooted question in some aspects of this controversy—whether the right of issuing injunctions where property and property rights are threatened with irreparable injury and no adequate remedy exists at law, is not gradually being extended so as to take in, partially at least, personal rights. And I think that if this section of the law is passed as it now stands you leave room for argument, at least, that there is an express authorization of the statute which by implication permits the issuance of injunctions in that class of cases.

The language that I have offered as a substitute for this section is, as is well known, a part of the Bartlett bill, and is unobjectionable, and plainly states the object for which it is intended. I think that it is very important that this change should be made, so that there can be left upon the statute no question as to whether the right to extend the issuance of injunction to this field has been granted.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MacDONALD] and to explain this provision.

The language that the gentleman objects to is substantially the language of rule 73 of rules of practice for the courts of equity adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Clayton anti-injunction bill that was passed at the last session of Congress contained a similar provision, which was modified in this bill so as to make it conform to rule 73 adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States in equity cases. We did not desire to disturb that rule; but the fact that they have adopted it as a court rule is no reason why we should not incorporate it into the statute, especially when we are dealing with the general subject of injunctions.

Mr. MacDONALD. Is it true that there is nothing in this section but what is the practice now under the law and the rules?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I am not sure of that; but the point I make is that the first part of the language that the gentleman moves to strike out follows the language of rule 73 of the Supreme Court of the United States in equity cases, formulated and adopted by the Supreme Court since the passage of the Clayton bill in the Sixty-second Congress. I will incorporate that rule in my remarks:

Rule 73.

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIONS AND TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDERS.

No preliminary injunction shall be granted without notice to the opposite party. Nor shall any temporary restraining order be granted without notice to the opposite party, unless it shall clearly appear from specific facts, shown by affidavit or by the verified bill, that immediate and irreparable loss or damage will result to the applicant before the matter can be heard on notice. In case a temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice, in the contingency specified, the matter shall be made returnable at the earliest possible time, and in no event later than 10 days from the date of the order, and shall take precedence of all matters, except older matters of the same character. When the matter comes up for hearing the party who obtained the temporary restraining order shall proceed with his application for a preliminary injunction, and if he does not do so the court shall dissolve his temporary restraining order. Upon two days' notice to the party obtaining such temporary restraining order, the opposite party may appear and move the dissolution or modification of the order, and in that event the court or judge shall proceed to hear and determine the motion as expeditiously as the ends of justice may require. Every temporary restraining order shall be forthwith filed in the clerk's office.

The other provisions of the section have been very carefully considered. No material change has been made in the other provisions of the Clayton injunction bill, which was thoroughly considered and passed at the last session of the Congress.

While in the past some courts have followed the general principles laid down in those provisions of this bill that relate to injunctions, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD] to the fact that we have many Federal courts in this country, and that a great many of the judges have adopted rules contrary to the principles laid down here and have enforced them in their respective courts; and the Committee on the Judiciary in preparing this injunction bill made an effort to follow the better line of decisions of the Federal courts and to put in the statute an inhibition that would prevent courts that had been abusing the writ of injunction by issuing it in cases in which we do not feel that the issuance of an injunction was justified from doing so in the future.

Mr. MACDONALD. Does the gentleman refer to cases of injunctions where it is doubtful whether the injunction is based upon threatened injury of personal rights rather than property or property rights?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We preserve that distinction in the bill.

Mr. MACDONALD. Not in terms.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think so.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. I should like to have the gentleman explain about this section. What is the time of the notice given in case of a restraining order where irreparable injury is claimed? How much of a notice is provided for in this bill?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It may be issued without notice, but unless the parties proceed within 10 days the suit abates and must be dismissed. The rule of the Supreme Court is more liberal than the provision of the bill passed at the last session, which provided for 7 days and a renewal of 7 days, which would make 11 days; but the rule of the Supreme Court which is incorporated here requires the parties to proceed within 10 days or the suit will abate and must be dismissed.

Mr. MURDOCK. The language of the bill is that no preliminary injunction shall be issued without notice to the opposite party. There must in every case be some notice.

Mr. BARTLETT. Unless——

Mr. MURDOCK. Unless irreparable injury to property is claimed.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. The provisions of the second paragraph are precisely in keeping with the better practice now. Is that right?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; that is what we understand.

Mr. MURDOCK. But you are writing into statutory law a rule of the Supreme Court. Is that right?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; absolutely. In the consideration of this question we examined the decisions. One court would hold that a certain practice was lawful and would refuse to issue an injunction. Another court would proceed to issue an injunction, and it was this wrongful issuance of injunctions in cases where courts were not justified under the facts in issuing them that has given rise to this criticism of the Federal courts.

We propose to write the better practice of the Federal courts into the statute as a rule to govern all the courts, and not leave it to their discretion to issue injunctions on whatever state of fact may suit the fancy of the judge.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That every order of injunction or restraining order shall set forth the reasons for the issuance of the same, shall be specific in terms, and shall describe in reasonable detail, and not by reference to the bill of complaint or other document, the act or acts sought to be restrained, and shall be binding only upon the parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, or those in active concert with them and who shall, by personal service or otherwise, have received actual notice of the same.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish the gentleman from North Carolina would explain section 17.

Mr. WEBB. The main purpose of the section is to bind nobody to the statute except the agent and those in active service; the parties enjoined are those who have actual interests.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is this as in the case of section 15 merely writing into the statutory law the practice of the court?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I think the case of In re Lennon is practically embodied in this section. It has not always been the practice in the Federal courts, but we are making or trying to make a uniform practice for all the courts.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We prohibit what is known as the blanket injunction. Courts have issued injunctions against parties without naming them and so a man might be in California and violate an order of the court in New York and not know it, and be brought into court for contempt in violating the order. The main purpose of this section is to prevent what is commonly known as the blanket injunction.

Mr. MURDOCK. This makes it specific?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; it does away with what as the gentleman from Arkansas says is a blanket injunction and protects every man who may come within the injunction law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think there is to be some contest in regard to section 18, is there not?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. I thought the Clerk might read section 18 and then we would leave that open for amendment to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendments are withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business or happens to be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person engaged in such dispute, any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner, and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the House has been in continuous session since 11 o'clock this morning, 10 hours and a half. It has been a very strenuous day, and on behalf of the committee I want to thank the Members who have stayed here and assisted us. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly, the committee rose, and Mr. FITZGERALD, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION (H. DOC. NO. 1004.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the report of the Commission on National Aid to Vocational Education, which was ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Education.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD

Mr. MURDOCK. Upon what subject?

Mr. CURRY. I want to print in the RECORD a speech delivered by my colleague, Hon. JULIUS KAHN, at the memorial service held by the Grant Circle of the Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. WEBB. Is there any criticism of the Executive in that speech?

Mr. CURRY. Not that I know of; I have not read it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBB. I regret very much to object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Is there any reason why a Member of Congress should not criticize the Executive?

Mr. WEBB. No; except that the Member might come here and do it instead of having another Member put it in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. If there are to be no speeches placed in the RECORD which criticizes the Executive, there will be no speeches extended in the RECORD praising him.

Mr. WEBB. We do not know what is in the speech, and the gentleman from California himself does not know.

Mr. MANN. If it is not a proper speech, it will be stricken out of the RECORD. We authorized three speeches this morning to be printed in the RECORD, and the gentleman from North Carolina did not know what was in either one of them, and one was a speech by the President.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman from Illinois wants to publish a speech that has not been read, and the gentleman does not know what is in it, very well.

Mr. CURRY. This can not be an objectionable speech; it was delivered before the U. S. Grant Circle of the Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE SPEAKER.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article published in the Washington Herald of Sunday, written by former Representative John Q. Tilson, of Connecticut, with reference to Speaker CLARK.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 2, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 2, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, by Thy own grace Thou hast bestowed upon us the measureless gifts of life. Thou hast never tired in expressing Thy care for Thy creatures. Day by day Thou dost shower upon us the unmerited blessings of Thy grace. We pray that in order that we may enjoy and use the blessings that come from the Divine hand we may gain possession of our own powers, will, conscience, and thought, and that these being brought into the realms of freedom by being brought into accord with Thy will may be the means of our enjoyment and of the using of Thy gifts. Lead us this day in all the service that we can perform for our Government, and may Thy blessing abide with Thy servants in the Senate. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

IRRIGATION DEVELOPMENT IN AUSTRALIA.

Mr. JONES. I have here an address delivered by Elwood Mead, engineer department of the state rivers and water supply commission, Victoria, Australia. Mr. Mead was formerly connected with the Agricultural Department of our Government. The address deals with conditions under irrigation projects and gives a statement as to how the farmers there have been aided and the results of such aid. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SYSTEMATIC AID TO SETTLERS THE FIRST NEED IN IRRIGATION DEVELOPMENT.

[Address delivered at the Irrigation Conference, Denver, Colo., on Apr. 9, 1914, by Elwood Mead, C. E., chairman state rivers and water supply commission, Victoria, Australia.]

For the past seven years I have had the privilege of working for a government that has shown great wisdom and sagacity in its social and industrial legislation. Nowhere has this been more conspicuous than in its land and water laws and the policy followed in irrigation development. In this it has blazed trails which this country can follow to advantage. Recently I explained to Gov. Johnson, of California, the methods by which Victoria, one of the Australian States, is securing settlers on its irrigated lands and aiding them to rapidly become self-supporting and prosperous. He was greatly interested, and asked me to come to this convention as a delegate from California and explain what I had told him. Believing that a national policy of aid to settlers on irrigated lands will prove of immense value in developing this country and stop the drift of American farmers to other lands, I availed myself of the governor's suggestion, and did this the more readily because of the opportunity of meeting many whom I had formerly known.

The absence of adequate financial help for settlers during the first five years is the main cause for the stagnation in irrigation development in this country and for the calling of this conference. One only needs to put himself in the place of the settler to realize what a costly and serious venture it is to attempt to transform unimproved land into an irrigated farm and how much danger there is to the man of small capital that the attempt will prove a disaster. Before the settler can have any return from his land he must do many things not required in an unirrigated country. A house must be built, ditches dug, land cleared and graded, seed sown, and the somewhat difficult art of irrigation mastered under untried conditions before he can have any return. While this is being done there is no income. His scanty capital is being swallowed up in living expenses. Often there is much hardship for himself and his family. Many a poor settler's wife has aged 10 years in 10 months. If money has to be borrowed, interest rates are excessive, and all combine to discourage those to whom these conditions are strange and new.

To these have been added in recent years great increases in charges for land and water. Costly dams and permanent works mean much higher water charges than were paid by the earlier generation of irrigators, until the marvel is not that many fail, but than any endure. With water rights costing from $40 to $60 per acre and with the present western interest rates, the chances are all against the success of the settler who has less than $5,000 or $6,000 capital. The question which now needs to be decided is whether opportunities under national or private works are to be restricted to men with this or larger capital, or poorer men encouraged by helping them to improve their farms.

PROBLEMS OF SETTLEMENT HAVE BEEN NEGLECTED.

Thus far in America we have almost entirely ignored the requirements of colonization and settlement. We have looked upon the building or irrigation works and the marketing of irrigation securities as the main problems of irrigation development. We have not given enough thought to the obstacles which confront the farmer in completing the work of reclamation, and the risks and hardships imposed on himself and his family when they undertake the development of raw land, and the payment of high charges now imposed. Another mistake has been to regard irrigation enterprises as something which could be paid for quickly. We have taken it for granted that if the works were built the farmer would come forward and foot the bills. The actual facts are entirely different. Irrigation works do not create irrigated agriculture. The money spent on dams and canals must be followed by an equal or greater expenditure for houses, farm buildings, fences, grading, and ditching fields before the water can be used and irrigation works have either revenue or productive value.

Owing to settlers not being able to obtain financial aid many have not been able to complete the preparation of their land for irrigation in a reasonable time, and, as a result, have failed, when through timely assistance they would have succeeded. These failures have deterred others from attempting settlement, hence a large part of the irrigable land is unoccupied. Until this is changed the reclamation of irrigated land will continue to involve regrettable hardship and loss to many deserving settlers. Development will be slow and irrigation securities will have uncertain value. Irrigation works will not fulfill their greatest purpose, which is to create opportunities for poor men, and American farmers will continue to emigrate to the ready-made irrigated farms of Australia and Canada.

STATE AID IS FEASIBLE.

Adequate financial aid for settlers during the first five years is the greatest question before this conference. It is also the one about which there is likely to the greatest difference of opinion. No one, I think, doubts its need or value if wisely and honestly managed, but many do not regard it as feasible simply because it has not been attempted.

With respect to the latter, I have had during the past five years a most convincing and instructive experience. As chairmen of the State water commission of Victoria I have assisted in carrying out one of the most complete schemes of State aid to irrigated settlement ever attempted. Its success will, I hope, encourage this country to adopt a similar policy.

Seven years ago the situation under the irrigation schemes of Victoria was not unlike that under the Reclamation and Carey Acts projects to-day. Canals were built, water was available, but settlers were not there to use it, and hence the works were unprofitable. The State government determined to change this by creating conditions which would enable anyone who had industry and thrift to secure an irrigated farm, even if he had little or no money, and which would warrant its inviting settlement from distant countries. It has succeeded in its purpose by requiring only small initial payments and giving adequate aid and direction. No charge is made for water rights, and the annual payments for water are only intended to cover 4 per cent interest on the cost of works and the expenses of operation and maintenance. The cash payment on land is only 3 per cent of its cost and 31½ years is given in which to complete payments with interest at 4½ per cent. Houses are built for settlers on a cash payment of about one-fourth the cost, payments of the remainder may extend over 20 years with 5 per cent interest. The State, when desired, grades and seeds a portion, up to one-fourth, of each farm, on the payment of one-fifth the estimated cost, and allows the payments of the remainder to extend over 10 years. It employs disinterested expert advisers to help the settler select his farm, buy his horses and cows, and do what is needed to get established on his farm. The saving in money and time which this system effects can only be appreciated by those who have seen it in operation. Many settlers select their farm and arrange for the erection of their house before leaving Europe; are able to go directly from the ship to their new home, and have a living income from a dairy herd within a month from their arrival.

The State follows up this initial assistance by loaning the settler 60 per cent of the value of any improvements he makes. This enables men with small capital to complete without delay the grading, seeding, and improvement of their farms. The settler does not need to halt when he exhausts his own capital. When he has one field graded he can borrow money on that to grade another.

This generous aid and the thoughtful consideration for his welfare is a great encouragement and incentive to the ambitious and earnest beginners. I have never seen elsewhere men work as hard or achieve as much in the first two years as on those Victorian settlements. But all who come are not industrious or capable. Such a scheme is especially attractive to the visionary and incompetent. Some of the settlers seem to regard the house, the farm, and the graded fields as an endowment, and to believe that the State which has done so much to help them succeed will do the remainder. To help the inexperienced and guard against being imposed upon by the idler or indifferent, the State employs in each district a tactful, practical farmer who is the friend, counsellor, and adviser of the working settler and a stimulator to others. When his efforts and influence fail the fact is reported to the head office. The settler knows of this and also knows that such report will have a controlling influence in determining whether or not he is to obtain loans or be given sympathetic treatment when payments are delayed. The law is so framed that the commission administering it has discretion to defer payments where settlers are unfortunate, but it also has authority to eliminate promptly any settler who fails to show earnestness, industry, and thrift.

This scheme of comprehensive aid has now been in operation for six years. The settlements that are three years old are practically established and self-supporting. It is the unanimous opinion of all those familiar with development that nowhere else have they seen such rapid progress in the cultivation of land or such large returns in the earlier years of settlement. One of the inspectors was formerly a successful farmer in the Imperial Valley, Cal. It is his belief that as much progress is made in these settlements in Victoria during 18 months as was made on an average in the Imperial Valley in 5 years.

One can not help being inspired by the hope, the gratitude, and the tremendous industry that is everywhere manifest. The government that inaugurated these measures is nearer a real democracy than a government that leaves the settler to struggle unaided. While Australia and New Zealand have led in the movement to aid settlers, their example is now being followed in other developing countries. South Africa has adopted it, and the newspapers report that British Columbia intends to adopt it. The Canadian Pacific Railway is loaning each settler on its irrigated tracts in aid of these initial improvements, and the Argentine is beginning to consider making such aid a feature of its colonization policy.

SHOULD THE POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES BE CHANGED?

The adoption of a similar policy in the United States would relieve settlers of much anxiety and hardships without imposing any burden on the taxpayer. By using the public credit long terms for repayment could be obtained at low rate of interest, and with settlers fitted for their work and given practical advice by the Government, repayment of loans would be assured, and development would then continue under opportunities as favorable as those provided in other countries. Every condition that has secured the success of State aid in Australia exists here in equal or greater measure. The tenant farmers of the Middle West furnish a large body of the very best class of settlers. The country does not have to look for them on the other side of the world. The lands are here, the works have been built. All that is needed is the inauguration of some businesslike scheme which will provide the funds and exercise the necessary direction and oversight over the settlers.

The greatest need in this country is the complete use of the works already built. From Colorado to California are private and public works, with less than half the land under cultivation, and with inadequate revenues are struggling to maintain their financial credit. Suitable settlers would completely change the situation. Under some of these schemes the conditions for extending this aid are altogether satisfactory, while under others settlement under present conditions should be prevented. Either the water supply is inadequate, the land is unfit, or the charges for land and water are too high. To extend public aid in the settlement of such enterprises means inevitable disaster to all concerned, and the first step in all such cases should be an investigation by some competent public authority to weed out the sound from the unsound schemes. Starting with sound enterprises there should, in each case, be an organization to meet and take charge of the settlers, and there must be some way by which large sums of money can be provided to give them the necessary aid.

In the State of Victoria this money is provided in a large measure by the State Savings Bank, which has deposits of $110,000,000, on which 3 and 3½ per cent interest is paid. This money is loaned directly to the farmers at 4½ and 5 per cent. A remote country, with small accumulations, thus gives the farmers money at about half the interest rates prevailing in the western part of the United States. It would seem that the Victorian policy might wisely be followed in the United States, and the funds deposited in the postal savings bank of the Nation loaned to farmers developing irrigated lands rather than to the banks, as at present. The experience of all of the Australian States shows that not only is this a safe use for these funds, but it can be made a great agency for national development. Safety could be further insured by an arrangement under which the States would guarantee the returns of all funds loaned to settlers within their boundaries. In any event, the cost of improving land is as great as the expense of providing water for it, and if we are to have a humane and rounded out scheme of development the settler's side must receive more consideration.

INTERSTATE TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. OLIVER. I have here a memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade protesting against the passage of the interstate trade commission bill. It is not a long article, and I ask leave to have it printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROTEST AGAINST PASSAGE OF BILL PROVIDING FOR THE CREATION OF AN INTERSTATE TRADE COMMISSION.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist, the Philadelphia Board of Trade, respectfully represents:

That there has been introduced in the House of Representatives a bill entitled H. R. 14361, providing for the creation of an interstate trade commission.

Your memorialist is opposed to the proposed legislation for the following reasons:

PURPOSE OF THE COMMISSION.

Under the title of a trade commission the bill provides for the creation of a committee or body of three members, which shall have power to investigate the business of any corporation or class of corporations, with certain exceptions. It may require statements by any corporation within its jurisdiction of its financial condition, its trade relations, its business methods, etc., and may enforce the production of its business and other records and the attendance of its officers, employees, or other witnesses. In general purpose and effect it is intended to subject all of the business of the country (not already under commission supervision) to governmental supervision.

It should be noted that this body is not a court or judicial tribunal properly constituted to try and determine alleged infractions of any law or laws, but a body expressly authorized to impose upon the business of the country, or such classes of business as may be designated by it, the duty and burden of reporting annually to it the full record and account of its transactions.

PRINCIPLES OF FREE GOVERNMENT.

The only proper basis we believe, on which Government can in general interfere in either individual or business life is in laying down certain general rules or principles of conduct, applicable to all, and providing the necessary machinery for their enforcement. A proper tribunal, whether called a court or commission, whose duty it is to hear and determine charges of infractions of the law properly brought before it, is an essential part of the machinery for the enforcement of the law. A commission whose duty it is to "smell out" offenders or to require reports and generally oversee the details of business life has no place in the machinery of a free government.

Supervision of business merely as supervision is no more necessary to the public welfare, no more desirable, and no more possible than the supervision of the details of individual life. In either case it is indefensible on principle and is justly to be characterized as an objectionable form or characteristic of paternalism.

STATESMANSHIP V. POLITICS.

Accompanying the vast business expansion of the past 25 years there have been discernible certain practices which the sound moral judgment of the community disapproved. They comprised rebates given by public-service corporations (whose semipublic character should require them to treat all alike), willful and malicious attempts to injure competitors (outside the realm of the injury incident to fair competition), and attempts to acquire absolute control of particular industries. In the reaction against these things the public judgment should not be warped, sound principles of government should not be forgotten, and meretricious expedients should not be adopted.

The fact which we seek to emphasize is that every one of these admitted evils has been fully legislated against; the country has adequate courts to enforce the law and officers charged with the duty of prosecution where the offenses are charged. During the last five or six years public opinion has called for the rigid enforcement of the law. The law has been enforced, rebates have stopped, malicious injuries to competition have been punished, and great industries dissolved into small competitive fragments. Whether all of this will inure to the public welfare or not, whether in some respects the existing law may not be too stringent, we leave for time to determine. What we confidently assert, however, is that no one who has followed the history of these things can doubt the sweeping and effective character of the existing law to prohibit existing evils or the efficiency of the existing machinery for enforcing the law when that machinery is once set in motion.

Under the circumstances additional legislation will tend to confuse rather than clarify and is open to the just suspicion of political expediency.

GOVERNMENT BY COMMISSION.

In the reaction which has followed our great period of expansion the States have very generally attempted the experiment of commission rule for all public-service corporations. The Federal Government has adopted the same expedient with respect to the railroads. It would be unfair to so characterize these measures without giving the reasons for our belief that in their present form, at least, these commissions are experimental and have not yet demonstrated their right to a permanent place in our institutions.

1. THE FUNDAMENTAL DIFFICULTY.

In the first place, then, these commissions (so far as they are empowered to regulate prices) are all founded upon the anomalous principle that persons, without any direct responsibility for the consequences, without personal and first-hand knowledge of the requirements, and subject to influences of political expediency, are delegated to determine what this or that public-service corporation needs and shall earn. When it is considered that a large part of the savings of the country are invested in these companies, the outcome seems fraught with uncertainty and danger.

2. THE COST.

The commissions, Federal and State, have entailed a heavy burden of expense upon the community, directly upon business and indirectly upon the people as a whole. This expense is partly due to the cost of maintenance of the commissions themselves, but in much larger part to the requirements imposed by the commissions on the individuals or corporations coming within their jurisdiction. The data collected and furnished by one public-utility company at the request of one commission cost upward of $100,000, irrespective of the services of the officers and employees. If this were a fair average per State for each corporation (as to which we have not sufficient data for judgment), it would mean that the aggregate expense of the experiment of commission supervision of the public utilities alone will come to an enormous total.

An independent public-utility company doing a small but steady business was forced by the additional expense imposed by the commission requirements of its State to cease doing business, and its only method of saving the value of its assets was by sale to a competitor of sufficient size to bear without breaking the additional burden.

Probably most of the public-service corporations are to-day confronted with the concrete fact that if new money is needed to develop the service which they render to the community it must be raised by bond issues and heavy premiums paid to those who take the risk of disposing of the bonds. This condition is less sound from the economic standpoint than one in which the necessary funds can be raised on sales of stock, and the reason for the condition is very simple—if the commissions limit the amounts which the companies may earn, the public have no sufficient inducement to invest in stocks; if the commissions impose on the companies heavy additional expense, the security for the bonds is depreciated. This condition must result unfavorably to the public in the end: it means less efficient service at higher prices.

If the final result of commission supervision over public-service corporations is to make the transaction of the public-service business unduly expensive (the community eventually paying the expense), is to prevent competition by tending to eliminate all but the larger and more powerful units, and is finally to so limit the credit of these companies and curtail the inducements they can offer to investors, that they are unable to finance themselves except at exorbitant rates, the systems of supervision by commissions is bad for the community and must eventually be modified or abandoned.

3. INDIRECT EFFECTS.

The indirect effects of governmental interference through commissions in business are not to be lightly ignored. While the general depressed condition of business and great shrinkage in values will doubtless be attributed by different persons to different causes—to foreign complications, to tariff charges, to world-wide movements of uncertain character, or other causes—one of the conditions powerfully affecting this country is undoubtedly this: The savings of the people of this country are invested chiefly in the business of the country. The vast sums invested in the railroads are confronted with the restrictive control of railroad earnings by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as well as by a mass of legislation in the several States exacting new forms of taxation, requirements of extravagant service, limitations of charges, etc. The almost equally large volume of savings invested in the public utilities is confronted with the same general problems through the operations of the commissions appointed in the various States.

The results of this restrictive legislation is apparent to all in the present difficulty experienced by the railroads and other public utilities in obtaining necessary capital, in the consequent stoppage of normal growth, and in the shrinkage of the value of their securities. However much other causes may intervene to assist in the general depression, the curtailment of the purchasing power of this large portion of the business agents of the country must and does play a large part in the unfavorable conditions which to-day exist.

CONCLUSION.

Under these circumstances we respectfully submit that wisdom and sound judgment require that the effect upon the country of commission supervision of the public-service corporations be carefully noted over a series of years before any attempt should be made to extend that system in any degree beyond its present limits.

If after a full and complete test commission control over railroads and public utilities is modified or developed into a system beneficial to the country, it will be ample time to consider in what form, if at all, Government should intervene to regulate the initiative and activities of individuals or corporations not engaged in public service but in private enterprise. In the meantime both public and private rights are amply guarded by existing law.

For the above reasons, among others, your memorialist respectfully submits that the interstate trade commission bill should not receive your favorable consideration.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

On motion, the report was accepted and the following resolutions adopted:

"1. Resolved, That the memorial issued by the officers and committee in charge, under the direction of this board, opposing the so-called omnibus antitrust bill is hereby approved.

"2. Resolved, That the officers be instructed to enter a negative vote to the referendum submitted by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States to its members in relation to the creation of an interstate trade commission.

"3. Resolved, That the officers be instructed to issue the memorial submitted to this council by the committee on legislation in opposition to the proposed interstate trade commission."

NOTE.—A copy of the memorial opposing the passage of the omnibus antitrust bill (H. R. 15657), as formulated by the committee on "legislation" under the authority of a resolution adopted at the meetng of the board held April 20, 1914, accompanies this summary.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—REPUBLIC COAL CO.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to make a personal statement.

On the 23d of March last, when Senate joint resolution No. 41, providing for the sale of certain coal lands to the Republic Coal Co., of Montana, was before the Senate and under discussion, I had the floor, and after having made a statement that the Republic Coal Co. was a subsidiary company of the Chicago, Milwaukee & Puget Sound Railway Co. and that so far as that resolution was concerned it was practically identical with that railway company, I used this language:

> The Northern Pacific owns each alternate section of coal lands there and will not sell any coal to a competing line. It absolutely refuses to treat with it or deal with it or negotiate with it at all.

At the time I used that language I believed it to be entirely and literally true. I had so understood. Shortly thereafter I received a letter from Mr. J. M. Hannaford, president of the Northern Pacific Railway Co., in which he called my attention to that language and informed me that it was not correct, and stated that he had had some correspondence with the manager of the Republic Coal Co. looking to the leasing of some of the coal lands of the Northern Pacific Railway Co.; that he had made the manager of the Republic Coal Co. a figure on leasing some of the coal lands of the Northern Pacific Railway Co., and that the manager of the Republic Coal Co. claimed that he could not pay the price and had declined to enter into a lease at the price quoted.

Mr. Hannaford asked me for the source of my information on the subject, and I gave him as my informant the manager of the Republic Coal Co. That gentleman was in the city at the time, and I called to his attention the letter of Mr. Hannaford and he verified Mr. Hannaford's statement. He said that the Northern Pacific Railway Co. had made to him a price on the leasing of some coal land, but he claimed that the price was prohibitive and was beyond his reach, and that he could not afford to pay it, and therefore no lease had been entered into.

I had been under the impression that the Northern Pacific Railway Co. had absolutely refused to negotiate with or deal with the manager of the Republic Coal Co. at all and so stated, but upon having my attention called to the statement I learned the facts to be, as acknowledged by both sides, that a price had been quoted, and that the manager of the Republic Coal Co. claimed that the quoted price was prohibitive, and that therefore he could not afford to enter into a lease at the price named. I suppose that is a matter of opinion between him and the president of the Northern Pacific Railway Co.

I now make this statement, in order to correct and set right my former statement, made under a misapprehension, which I believed to be correct at the time. It appears that the reason why no lease has been entered into has been because of a difference of opinion between the management of the two institutions as to what the Republic Coal Co. could afford to pay the Northern Pacific Railway Co. for coal in the vicinity of the operations of the former company. The misstatement that I made was entirely unintentional on my part and I was entirely innocent in making it.

While believing that it is right that the Republic Coal Co. should have coal for the operation of its trains on the Milwaukee Railroad, believing that it is an absolute necessity, and believing still, as I do, that Senate joint resolution No. 41 is a just and meritorious measure and that the Republic Coal Co. should be allowed to buy coal from the Government at a reasonable price, at the same time I do not wish to do any injustice to the management of the Northern Pacific Railway Co. I stated that the Northern Pacific Railway Co. refused to negotiate with the Republic Coal Co. for the leasing or sale of any coal lands. I know that the manager of the Republic Coal Co. never intended to mislead me and would not do so. Doubtless he told me that he had "been unable to negotiate" a sale or lease with the Northern Pacific, meaning that they had been unable to come to terms, while I gained therefrom the idea that the Northern Pacific had refused to negotiate. I now know there was no refusal to negotiate but an inability of the parties to effect a negotiation, on account of differences of opinion. It was an innocent misapprehension on my part. I know that the manager of the Republic Coal Co. never intended to mislead or misinform me. It was my own misunderstanding.

I realize that the Northern Pacific Railway Co. and the Chicago, Milwaukee & Puget Sound Railway Co. are both great institutions, each of which has done a grand work for the State of Montana, the great northwest, and the entire country. Each is entitled to just and fair consideration, and I want each to have equal rights and just and fair treatment; nothing more and nothing less. I would not knowingly reflect on either. I highly esteem both.

I would not wish any statement of mine which would do injustice to either one to go uncorrected. Therefore I take great pleasure in making the correction I have just made.

I do not believe that the innocent misstatement which I made was material to the merits of the subject under discussion. I still believe Senate joint resolution 41 meritorious, and that it should speedily pass the Senate and House. The correction I have made is immaterial to its merits and is in nowise prejudicial to it and does not affect its rights. However, I do not wish any statement of mine, whether material to justice or not, to misrepresent anyone.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 384) submitted yesterday by Mr. CUMMINS, as follows:

> Resolved, That immediately after the final disposition of the bill now the unfinished business the Senate take up for consideration S. 4522, to amend the interstate-commerce act relating to liability of common carriers.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I believe time can be saved by the suggestion which I am about to make. I expect to debate this resolution long enough to show why the bill to which it refers should receive consideration very soon, but I believe we can dispose of the bill in less time than it will require me to debate the resolution. I therefore again ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4522.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I observe that there are certain amendments to the bill which will be offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and I can not assume that the bill will not take time for debate. The report on the bill was made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is the chairman of the subcommittee which considered the bill. The Senator from Arkansas is absent from the city and will be absent for a week or 10 days. I should much prefer that the Senator from Iowa would permit this matter to lie over until the Senator from Arkansas returns.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not hear the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I stated that the chairman of the subcommittee which had the bill under consideration was the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; that he reported the bill; that he is now absent in Arkansas and will not be back for 10 days at least; and I suggested that the Senator from Iowa should let the matter lie over until the Senator from Arkansas returns.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas is earnestly in favor of this bill. He and myself were members of the subcommittee that had hearings upon the bill, and one of the last things that he said to me before he went home was to lose no opportunity to bring the bill before the Senate, and to do it at the earliest possible moment. I am sure that the Senator from Nevada is not speaking for the Senator from Arkansas when he asks delay.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have had no communication with the Senator from Arkansas regarding this bill, and I take it for granted, of course, that he expressed himself regarding it as the Senator from Iowa has indicated; but still there are amendments offered to this bill, and it seems to me entirely proper that the Senator from Arkansas should be here, as he is more familiar with the bill than anyone else. Therefore I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the matter should go over until his return.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, it is in the power of the Senator from Nevada to object——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I object.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I do not intend to postpone it because the Senator from Arkansas is absent, in view of the fact that he especially asked me not to postpone it, but to bring it on just as soon as I could. He realizes the importance of the bill quite as fully as I do, and he reported on behalf of the committee the amendments which are now printed in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa that I can not consent to his bill interfering with the consideration of what is called the Panama Canal tolls bill when the time comes for it to be taken up; and I can not consent to its consuming the time that properly should be devoted to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, which is now under consideration, and which, I think, will be finished this afternoon. I have no objection to considering the bill in which the Senator from Iowa is interested, provided the discussion can be closed on it by half past 12 or 1 o'clock; otherwise, I shall have to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, as a matter of parliamentary law, that an objection may be interposed at any time before 1 o'clock to the further consideration of the bill. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not understand what the Chair said with reference to the bill. Do I understand that objection can be made to its further consideration at any time before 1 o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; objection can be made to its further consideration at any time before 1 o'clock.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The bill will not, then, take its place as the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly not; it will go back to the calendar undisposed of at that time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does not the objection, which can be interposed at any time, relate to a bill which has been taken up under Rule VIII? After the Senate gives unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, I do not think that a Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It relates, in the opinion of the Chair, to a bill taken up in the morning hour not on motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Such a bill may be objected to at any time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Such a bill may be objected to at any time during the morning hour. That is the understanding of the Chair with reference to the rule. The opinion of the Chair has been that as to a bill taken up without exception during the morning hour the Senate might discover that it was leading to too great an expenditure of time and stop it and send it back to the calendar. That has been the view of the Chair. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4522) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill and read to the word "transportation," in line 19, on page 2.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, is it proper to offer an amendment at this point? I understand this is merely the first reading of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the bill evidently should be read in its original form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the bill should be read first, and then amendments may be offered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to offer an amendment to this line of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the bill should be first read for the information of the Senate, and then amendments may be offered.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce was, on page 3, line 6, after the word "State," to insert "Territory, or the District of Columbia"; and in line 7, after the word "State," to insert "or Territory, or from a point in a State or Territory to a point in the District of Columbia, or for transportation wholly within a Territory," so as to read:

That any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company receiving property for transportation from a point in one State to a point in another State shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor, and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed; and any such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company so receiving property for transportation from a point in one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to a point in another State or Territory, or from a point in a State or Territory to a point in the District of Columbia, or for transportation wholly within a Territory, shall be liable to the lawful holder of said receipt or bill of lading.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 11, after the word "full," to strike out "actual value of such property" and insert "actual loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass"; so as to read:

For the full actual loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass, notwithstanding any limitation of liability or limitation of the amount of recovery or representation or agreement as to value in any such receipt or bill of lading, or in any contract, rule, regulation, or in any tariff filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission; and any such limitation, without respect to the manner or form in which it is sought to be made, is hereby declared to be unlawful and void.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Iowa precisely what difference in meaning there is between the language of the bill and the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We can not hear the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I inquired of the Senator from Iowa as to the exact difference in meaning between the language of the bill in its original form and the amendment, which, in lieu of the words "actual value of such property," proposes to insert "actual loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass."

Mr. CUMMINS. The language of the bill is not very happily chosen in this respect, but the difference is that if the property was damaged, not wholly destroyed, the words of the original bill would seem to have implied that the entire value of the property could be recovered, whereas it is the intent that only the actual loss or damage shall be recovered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also, on page 3, line 22, after the words "Provided, however," the committee proposes to strike out "That, if the property so offered and received for transportation," and in lieu thereof to insert "That, except as to ordinary live stock, if such property so offered and received for transportation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 25, after the word "or," the committee proposes to strike out the word "otherwise," and insert: "by other means, or if express authorization has been heretofore granted or shall be hereafter granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the establishment and maintenance of rates for the transportation thereof dependent upon the value of the property shipped, as stated in writing by the consignor and reference given in the rate schedule to such authorization, then."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will ask the Senator from Iowa to give us a word of explanation of this amendment before it is agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it might be well to state at this point just what the difficulty is with the law as now construed by the Supreme Court.

Prior to 1906 it was the law in most of the States of the Union, either by statute or by the declaration of the courts of the State, that any agreement, rule, or regulation that sought to limit the liability of railway companies to less than the actual value of the property injured, or the actual loss or damage sustained by an individual, if a person was injured, was void as against public policy. I think it is well, possibly, at this point, to show that.

In our State, for instance—and I choose now one decision of the Supreme Court construing a statute of the State and one decision construing or applying the common law of the State as declared by its highest tribunal—in the case of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. against Solan, reported in One hundred and sixty-ninth United States, at page 133, the Supreme Court had before it for review the judgment of the Supreme Court of Iowa in a suit brought by a shipper of stock for injuries which he had sustained while upon an interstate journey accompanying the stock which he owned. The section of our code which relates to the subject is as follows:

> No contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt any corporation engaged in transporting persons or property by railway from liability of a common carrier or carrier of passengers which would exist had no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation been made or entered into.

This particular plaintiff had entered into an agreement with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road that in the event of injury to him the recovery should be limited to $500. He was injured, he sued, and the supreme court of the State held that under this section of the code the agreement which had been entered into was void, and that, notwithstanding the agreement, he had a right to recover his full damage. In the Supreme Court of the United States, to which the judgment was taken, it was urged that inasmuch as this was an interstate transaction, an interstate journey, and inasmuch as Congress had exclusive jurisdiction over interstate commerce, the statute of Iowa was invalid and could not apply to such an instance. The Supreme Court, however, in very decided and positive terms held that until Congress acted upon the particular subject the legislation of the State was effective and valid, and it affirmed the judgment of the Supreme Court of Iowa.

A little later there came before the Supreme Court the case of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. against Hughes, reported in One hundred and ninety-first United States, at page 477. There a horse had been shipped from New York to Pennsylvania, and the owner or shipper had agreed with the railroad company that in case of loss or in case of killing the animal the recovery should be not to exceed $100; I think that was the limitation. There was a trial, and the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held that the agreement was contrary to the policy of that State—that is to say, it was contrary to the common law of Pennsylvania—and entered a judgment for the full value of the horse. The judgment was taken for review to the Supreme Court of the United States; and then again the Supreme Court held that the law of the State, as declared by its highest judicial tribunal, was the law that must be applied to the instance, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the full value of the animal, notwithstanding the fact that it was injured in an interstate carriage, and that Pennsylvania, either through her legislature or through her courts, had a perfect right to determine the respective rights and liabilities of the persons interested until Congress acted.

Such was the law in nearly all of the States of the Union when in 1906 we came to revise the interstate-commerce law. There was, as you will remember, quite an extensive revision of the law in 1906, and as a part of that revision there was adopted what has become well known as the Carmack amendment. It is shown in the first paragraph of this bill. It reads:

> That any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company receiving property for transportation from a point in one State to a point in another State shall issue a receipt or a bill of lading therefor, and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered, or over whose line or lines such property may pass, and no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed: Provided, That nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under existing law.

It will be observed that the purpose of this amendment was to make the initial carrier liable for any loss or damage that might occur to property or persons during the entire carriage. I am sure it was not in the mind of Congress, and certainly not in the mind of the Senator who offered the amendment, to make any change whatsoever in the law to which I have referred governing the extent of recovery.

A year or two after that time, however, an express company lost a ring which had been committed to its care, and which was shipped under a contract for limited liability—$50, I believe, or $25. When that case reached the Supreme Court of the United States the court reviewed the entire field, and said that while before the Carmack amendment was adopted these State statutes and State laws through judicial interpretation were valid, yet inasmuch as Congress had acted upon the subject of bills of lading, and had not specifically provided against the exemption or immunity from liability to which I have referred, therefore all the State statutes and all the State judicial declarations upon the subject were abrogated, and that a common carrier could validly agree with a shipper that if a horse or an animal of any kind were shipped upon the rate that had been customary, if the animal were lost the recovery should be no more, we will say, than $25 or $30 or $40, as the railroad company might desire.

I shall not read the opinion of the court; it goes into the subject very carefully; and the conclusion I have stated will not be disputed by anyone who is familiar with it. It has been followed by three other decisions of the Supreme Court construing this amendment, all in harmony with the first one, the effect of which is to destroy what has been, I was about to say, from time immemorial the law of the country controlling this subject, and to make it valid for railroad companies to limit their liability to a certain sum which may be named in the bill of lading.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator that he read the title of the case and the volume, so that it may be in the RECORD.

Mr. CUMMINS. The title of the case is Adams Express Co. against Croniger. It is reported in volume 226 of the United States Supreme Court Reports, at page 491. I do not refer to the others, for they are of the same general tenor.

In this bill we have tried to restore to the shippers of this country not all, but a measure, of the rights which they possessed and which they exercised prior to the passage of the Carmack amendment, which inadvertently destroyed those rights. Therefore we provided that the railroad company should be liable to the lawful holder of the receipt or any other person for the full actual loss, damage, or injury caused by it—> notwithstanding any limitation of liability or limitation of the amount of recovery or representation or agreement as to value in any such receipt or bill of lading, or in any contract, rule, regulation, or in any tariff filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission; and any such limitation, without respect to the manner or form in which it is sought to be made, is hereby declared to be unlawful and void.

We understood perfectly well, however, that there were instances in which certain common carriers ought to have a right to limit their liability, especially in cases in which the goods shipped were concealed by boxing or wrapping; cases in which the common carriers could not have any knowledge with regard to the character or value of the goods.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may call the Senator's attention to the language just read, the thought has occurred to me that perhaps it was not broad enough to grant the relief which is desired in this respect.

Reading from line 11, the amendment is:

For the full actual loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier.

Of course if the injury was due directly to some act or omission on the part of the railroad company, then the holder of the bill of lading could recover the loss. Suppose, however, the property which was being transported was stolen or was injured by the act of some third party, would the company be liable for such injury under the terms of this amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the carrier would be liable if the damage came hrough any failure on its part to exercise that degree of care or that caution which the law imposes upon the common carrier. It was not the purpose, of course, in this amendment to either enlarge or diminish the care which the common carrier must bestow upon goods committed to its possession, or, in other words, to change its liability as an insurer.

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite sure it was not the intention of the draftsman to limit that rule, but I was fearful that the language employed was not broad enough to cover it.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator has an amendment that will cover it I will be glad to have him present it.

I was about to say, in cases where goods so offered to a common carrier are hidden or boxed it is impossible for the carrier to know what it is receiving. So we all thought, and I am sure you will all think, that it would be fair and reasonable for the carrier to stipulate a limitation upon its liability.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. The other contingency is if express authorization has been heretofore granted or shall be hereafter granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission then this prohibition against limitation of recovery does not apply. That exception, however, does not apply to ordinary live stock.

Mr. WARREN. Right there—the provision in line 22 on page 3 is a little blind to me. After the exception as to ordinary live stock, it goes on and speaks of property hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, and so forth. Is that exception intended to be made to cover ordinary live stock only and differentiate it from all other shipments of every nature? And does it prevent the practice prevalent heretofore in the shipment of live stock?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is impossible to hear the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is just what it is made to cover. That is the object of the bill. It will cover other things; but the real necessity for the bill arises from the impositions that are now being practiced by the common carriers upon the shippers and owners of live stock in this country.

Mr. WARREN. What I want to get at is this: When the bill passes, in what relation are the shippers of live stock and the railroads? Do they then operate under an agreed value of the live stock, and does that value cover any damage or loss?

Mr. CUMMINS. They do not. The very purpose of the bill is to prohibit the agreement with regard to a release of value to a certain point. That is to say, taking our State, our ordinary cattle, we will say, are worth $100 or $120 a head. They are now released, under the practice of the railroad company, to thirty or forty or fifty dollars a head, and when anything happens to them the shipper must accept his indemnity or his damages based upon this released value, or diminished value. The purpose is to put an end to that practice. It began since 1906, and it ought not to continue.

Mr. WARREN. In this proposed amendment of the law the language reads as follows:

Provided, however, That, except as to ordinary live stock, if such property so offered and received for transportation is hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, or by other means, or if express authorization has been heretofore granted or shall be hereafter granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission—

And so forth.

I do not quite see how that exception is grouped with the property hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, and so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose I bring to an express company a watch, and it is in a box. So the express company does not know——

Mr. WARREN. That part I understand perfectly, but not the regulation as to live stock where it says "except as to ordinary live stock."

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, the latter part of that clause contains two things: First, if the goods shall be hidden from view by wrapping or boxing. That, of course, does not touch live stock.

Or if express authorization has been heretofore granted, or shall be hereafter granted, by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the establishment and maintenance of rates for the transportation thereof dependent upon the value of the property shipped.

Mr. WARREN. Why make an exception as to live stock? The Interstate Commerce Commission will still have the power to permit higher rates on live-stock transportation if insurance and higher risk rates or values are insisted upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a rate upon live stock dependent upon value; that is, ordinary live stock I am speaking of.

Mr. WARREN. Then that exception is to retain and reserve from the Interstate Commerce Commission power to make rules or directions as to the shipment of live stock only, while allowing it to cover every other commodity or shipment of every nature. I see no good reason for that.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the purpose.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me that great danger lurks in the words in italics at the top of page 4:

Or if express authorization has been heretofore granted, or shall be hereafter granted, by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the establishment and maintenance of rates for the transportation thereof dependent upon the value of the property shipped, as stated in writing by the consignor, and reference given in the rate schedule to such authorization.

If you will study this language carefully, you will find it authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission practically to establish, in the case of each commodity, two special rates, one flat rate where there is an unconditional liability for loss or damage, and another rate by which the company can limit its liability. This is broad enough to cover everything but live stock; so that the Interstate Commerce Commission may, in respect to any commodity, establish two rates, and say that for such a rate there is unlimited liability, and for such a lower rate you can limit your liability by the bill of lading.

It seems to me that this is extending the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission to an unlimited extent. We know how it works in actual practice. A man comes to the railroad company to ship a certain commodity. He is handed a bill of lading, and he signs it, oftentimes without reading it. It may be a limited-liability bill; and the man wakes up when the loss or damage occurs to find out that he can only collect a limited amount of the damage sustained.

I think it is a most dangerous power to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that there ought not to be in any case any right to relieve themselves from liability.

Mr. CUMMINS. What the Senator from Minnesota has said is unquestionably true. The thing he overlooks is that the Interstate Commerce Commission not only now has the power to which he refers but it has exercised the power in many instances. The Interstate Commerce Commission has made a complete schedule of rates for the express companies of the country, and those rates are based upon value. The Interstate Commerce Commission has formulated and published the receipts or bills of lading or contracts which these companies make with their shippers, and in all of them, as I am informed, there is this limitation.

It is perfectly right, Mr. President, that there should be the limitation in such cases, simply because, first, the property may be entirely hidden, and, second, because in the great markets of the country there are many large shippers of certain kinds of articles who would rather bear the risk themselves and receive from the express companies a rate correspondingly less than the rate which would be imposed if the express company became the insurer against the higher value.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. REED. I take it that the Senator from Iowa in this bill only intends to protect a railroad company or a common carrier from being mulcted in heavy damages through the loss of some package the contents of which they did not have the opportunity to know. He does not mean to exempt them simply because the goods happen to be in a box?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, not at all.

Mr. REED. I think this bill does that identical thing. I want to call the Senator's attention to it. My examination has been somewhat hasty, and I may be in error. Beginning at line 23, on page 3, it reads:

That, except as to ordinary live stock, if such property so offered and received for transportation is hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, or by other means.

The language of the bill preceding that is that there shall be a liability. Then comes the proviso which excepts certain things out of the operation of the bill. It reads:

Provided, however, That, except as to ordinary live stock, if such property so offered and received for transportation is hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, or by other means—

Now, omitting the other language—

Then the rule of the common law shall apply.

In other words, if it is in a box hidden from view the rule of the common law absolutely applies. But the rule of the common law also applies if the Interstate Commerce Commission shall make certain rules and regulations. So, if a man brings to a railroad a box the contents of which are not visible the rule of the common law applies and there can be no recovery in that instance if there has been a contract limiting the liability imposed upon the shipper.

Mr. CUMMINS. There——

Mr. REED. The Senator will pardon me that I may make my point plain by a further word. Now, conceding the railroad ought to be given the right to limit its liability in the event it does not know and has not the means of knowing the contents of a package, still the test ought not to be the exemption; it ought not to exist simply because a thing is in a box and hidden from view. It might be reasonable to require a disclosure by the shipper, and if the shipper failed to make known the contents or falsely stated the contents then to deny him the right of recovery, but to make the fact that the article is inclosed in a box the test seems to me not to be in accordance with what I know the Senator from Iowa honestly desires to accomplish.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Missouri, in these two events, namely, if the property is hidden from view or if it is expressly authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the contract or rule or regulation of the common carrier is judged by the common law instead of by the statute which is here imposed. I agree that in some instances that will work injustice, but the hearings before the committee convinced us that in cities like New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Chicago, where the express companies gather up tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands, of packages in the course of an afternoon, it would be impossible to have the express company make an inquiry of the shipper with regard to the contents of each of those packages. Indeed we had great difficulty in the committee in preserving in the bill the words "in writing." It was contended by a great many that oral representations on the part of the shipper ought to be sufficient, and I hope that because we have not gone as far as we might go the Senator from Missouri will not regard that as an obstacle to the passage of the bill, because the things that are excepted from the prohibition found here are now subject to the common law. We are in no worse case because we have not attempted to cover them all in the bill.

Mr. REED. Would the Senator from Iowa really want to present a bill in this form: The rule of the common law shall apply to everything which is inclosed in a package whether the contents of the package are known to the common carrier or not? Now, that is what this bill means, if I interpret it aright.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is what it means.

Mr. REED. In other words, the minute you put a thing in a box the railroad company can limit its liability.

Mr. KERN. You limit it.

Mr. REED. You limit it by boxing it, although it may be a thing that has to be boxed. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] says no; you limit it. That is to say, when you present it you are required to sign a contract which, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has very wisely said, is signed in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred without reading, and thereby you find that a loss has occurred through the negligence of the shipper, and because you put it in a box you have been exempted from the beneficient operations of this law.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Senator from Missouri is hardly fair about that. Possibly he has not observed the latter part of the amendment. It must be hidden from view.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. CUMMINS. The value must be stated in writing by the consignor, and the rate must be based upon that lesser value. Those three things must concur in order to bring this exception within the rule of the common law.

Mr. REED. If it does not interrupt the Senator—I do not want to impose upon his good nature—it seems to me that the true test ought to be this: Did the common carrier know the contents of the package; not was it boxed and hidden from view, but did he know or have fair means of ascertaining the contents of the package? Now, suppose a man were to bring a package to an express company and suppose there was an invoice of the contents of that package printed right on it, so that the company had before it as complete knowledge as it could possibly obtain if the goods had been unwrapped, surely in that case the company has not been imposed upon; and if it is just to set aside the provisions of the common law when the goods are exposed actually to view, then the provisions of the common law should not be held to obtain when full knowledge as to the contents of the package is furnished an express company. I think that the language ought to be modified.

The Senator will pardon me for making a further suggestion. It will be noticed that the language of the exception is in the alternative. The goods are excepted from the beneficent provisions of the statute if they happen to be boxed, also any goods of any character except live stock, whether boxed or unboxed, hidden from view or disclosed to view, can be excepted by the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I very much doubt the wisdom of that, and, frankly, I have but little patience with any limitation upon the liability of a common carrier, except such a limitation as will protect it from fraud on the part of the shipper.

Now, mark you, there can be no liability on the part of a common carrier unless the common carrier has in some way been negligent. Of course, he is practically the insurer of the goods, but he does not insure against the act of God or of the public enemy, the unprecedented storm, or anything of that kind. You bring him the goods; they are put into his care; it is his duty to deliver them; and in State after State laws have existed for many years, which have been held to be valid, which absolutely provided that there could be no limitation in a contract which would exempt the company from full liability. Recently the Supreme Court of the United States has annulled all of those statutes by the decision to which the Senator refers.

I think it would be very much wiser to provide that no company could limit its liability, except where the shipper had falsely stated the value and contents of a package. In that event it would not be fair to hold a common carrier for full value, because if a man saw fit to ship a package of diamonds worth a large sum of money and upon being interrogated by the agent of the common carrier should say that the package contained some article of trifling value, that would be, in effect, a fraud upon the company; but where the contents are known, either through the fact that they can be seen by the agent of the common carrier or where the contents are made known at the time of the shipment, it seems to me there ought to be no limit of liability.

It might be entirely proper to permit a rising scale of prices for transportation, fixed upon the value; but that scale ought to be regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and not be left to the common carrier, and for this reason: A good illustration, although it is not exactly pat here, is the custom of the telegraph companies. For many years they had contracts—indeed, they have them yet, although they are not any longer enforced—saying that "This message is an unrepeated message; if you want it repeated, it will cost one-half more; and because it is an unrepeated message we are liable only for the price paid for transmitting the message." That contract was declared void by many of the courts of the States; but it illustrates the fact that when you give the common carrier the opportunity to make a rule by which he fixes his liability he will make the advanced charge so great, so onerous, so burdensome, that the shipper will not pay it; and if you are going to permit the common carrier to limit his liability in a contract, then the conditions upon which he can limit it ought to be very carefully fixed; otherwise we should find that the common carrier would impose every sort of injustice upon the shipper.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield gladly to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Would it not be a wiser provision to compel the shipper in every case to declare the value of the property that he ships, and then to provide that there should be no limitation beyond the declared value; in other words, require the shipper to state the value of the shipment and prohibit the common carrier from limiting his liability below that declared value?

Mr. REED. That was really the thought——

Mr. CUMMINS. That is just what is now being done.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. If I may be permitted to make a suggestion, that is precisely the evil which we are trying to correct. A man drives his carload of steers to town to send them to Chicago from my State, and there is put before him by the railroad company a bill of lading or a contract, which contains a declaration as to the value of those steers. The shipper signs that declaration. Of course, the declaration is well known by everybody to be false; I mean as to value. The shipper says the steers are worth $25 or $50 apiece; and the liability of the railroad company is limited to that amount. The shipper has no more chance to enter into an agreement with the railroad company upon even terms than a child would have in a wrestling match with a prize fighter.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I have the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to reply, however, to the Senator from Missouri. The subcommittee has given this matter a great deal of thought; we had long hearings upon the subject. The very thing that the Senator from Missouri thinks might be done, or ought to be done, I think is provided for here. The Interstate Commerce Commission is given authority to take certain things out of the prohibition of the statute if it grants express authority to make a rate based on value declared in writing. That is just what is done.

Let me suggest why that is necessary. Take a Kentucky race horse worth $25,000 which is delivered to the railroad company for shipment. The railroad company will not take the horse for anything like a reasonable or payable rate unless there is an agreement with regard to the amount of recovery. If the railroad company is held to be the insurer of that animal to the extent of $25,000, the rate becomes so high that shipment becomes impossible, and we must allow in such cases, if the Interstate Commerce Commission authorizes it, a recovery based upon declared value in order to secure a transportation rate that the shipper can pay and still accomplish his purpose.

I think if the Senator from Missouri will look further into the particular part of the amendment he is considering he will find that the very thing that he wants to accomplish is accomplished by the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. REED. I have the floor and have not yielded it. I am willing, however, that it shall be divided up in any amicable sort of way.

Mr. WEEKS. I was on my feet to ask a question 15 minutes before the Senator from Missouri got the floor. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me——

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. To extend somewhat the example which he has just given us. What I wanted to ask was, whether there are classifications of live stock so that the shipper will pay a rate dependent upon the classification? For instance, would he pay twice as high a rate on registered stock from Iowa to Chicago as he would on other stock worth one-half the price of the registered stock?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not quite answer the question of the Senator from Massachusetts, because the registered stock might be of high value or it might be of low value.

Mr. WEEKS. I mean assuming that it is twice the value of ordinary stock.

Mr. CUMMINS. All the railroads at this time have rates dependent on value in the shipment of live stock. The value is determined by the declaration of the shipper under the circumstances which I have just stated. If the shipper wants full value, and the value is not beyond the ordinary or common value of registered or pure-bred stock, he must pay 10 per cent or 15 per cent or 25 per cent more than the rate upon an ordinary live-stock shipment. That rate as applied to the ordinary case is prohibitive; the shipper can not pay it and do business, for, of course, the amount of it is absurdly high. It is based only on the idea that the higher rate is necessary to compensate the railway company for the increased risk; but it is greatly more than that in all the cases that I have examined. I object to it, however, as a matter of policy in ordinary shipments. The railroad companies only apply it to 10 or 12 subjects; they apply it to copper ore and iron ore, because they can not know what the value of ore is; they apply it to household goods; and they apply it to live stock. The live-stock shipments that are made under the rule established by the railroad companies, and which we seek to overturn here, I suppose, constitute 90 per cent of all the shipments that would be affected by this rule.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, let me take the Senator's own example of a Kentucky horse worth $25,000. Would an insurance company insure that horse for transportation any cheaper than would the railroad? Could it afford to do so?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have never instituted that comparison; I do not know.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the difficulty here does not lie in the fact that a rising rate charge is imposed, but it lies in the fact that the railroad company being given the power to fix a rising rate uses that power in such a way as to practically force a limitation on the liability they incur; in other words, let us say the ordinary shipping rate is $50 a car and that that is a fair rate. They hand the shipper a contract limiting the liability to one-tenth of the real value; he has the option to sign that contract or to pay $100 a car; and by that device they force him to take the risk which the law seeks to impose upon them. That being the case, it seems to me what we ought to require is a fair disclosure of the value to the carrier. A man ought not to be barred from that disclosure by the mere fact that he has put his goods in a box; and, having required a fair disclosure, then one thing further is necessary; it should be provided in the law that the carrier in making an advanced charge on account of the value must make only a reasonable charge, a charge that will reasonably compensate him for the risk incurred above the value of the ordinary article carried; and that power to regulate the advanced charges ought to be exercised either by Congress through law or by conferring the power upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the Interstate Commerce Commission regulates it, then manifestly the condition the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] speaks of would not be permitted to obtain; the carrier would not be allowed to say, "The ordinary rate for hauling cattle worth $10 a head is $50 a car; we will hand you a contract at $10 a head value; but if you want to have a contract that will allow $75 a head, the real value, then you will have to pay seven or eight times the fair rate charged." That would not do; and that being the device, the species of trickery, if you please, resorted to by these companies, it seems to me we ought to write into this bill a provision permitting the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate the charges which shall be imposed above the value of the ordinary article shipped, and then provide that there shall be no limitation of value below that by the railroad companies.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. I should like to get from the Senator from Missouri the information that I sought some time ago from the Senator from Iowa. It is this: Nine hundred and ninety-nine bills of lading out of a thousand are signed by the shipper without ever reading the bill of lading. There is a contract in them. Before 1906, I know, the shipper was in no way bound by the contract; but here is the great trouble about shipping on a bill of lading: A shipper, knowing the value of what he is shipping, as the Senator says, ought to declare it. Very often, however, a shipper carries something to the depot, turns it over to the agent, and does not know the real value. He may let the agent of the company know what the article is; yet the shipper does not know the real value, and he ought not to be bound by the bill of lading which he signs in order to make the shipment.

The Senator from Iowa referred to a Pennsylvania case where a horse was shipped, and the stipulation was that the owner should not recover more than $100. What I wanted to ascertain was whether that was a specific bill of lading or a general bill of lading that was signed in shipping the horse?

Mr. REED. I have not examined the decision, but judging from what I know of the decisions, I have no doubt that it does not make any difference whether it is what the Senator terms a specific bill of lading or a general bill of lading. The case certainly goes to the extent of holding that when a man signs a contract of shipment, that will constitute the specific contract for that particular case, though it might be a form which is handed out over the counter to every man and to which he signs his name without reading, just like a telegraph blank; when you write your message on it there is a contract printed on the back of it or at the top of it or at the bottom of it which you never read.

Mr. WEST. And which does not bind the sender of a telegram.

Mr. REED. It has been held in some States that it does bind him, but the great majority of modern decisions are the other way.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa a little further to the committee amendment on page 3, in which provision is made for liability for "actual loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier."

I am just a little afraid that this language might change the standard of liability by the common carrier of freight. The liability is that of an insurer, with certain exceptions. A liability might exist for the common carrier although the damage was not caused by the common carrier at all, the common carrier's liability being that of an insurer, subject, as I recall, to five exceptions, the exceptions being when the injury to the freight is caused by the act of God, public enemies, acts of the public authorities, acts of the shipper, and the inherent nature of the goods.

I desire to ask the Senator if perhaps it would not be better, instead of using the term "caused by it," to use the term "transported by it," so that the standard of liability might remain that of an insurer. I do not know that "transported by it" would do. That might broaden it too greatly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am strongly inclined to think the Senator is right, and I have no objection to that kind of an amendment; but I may be permitted to say that I am using there the precise language of the Carmack amendment. This is a revision or rewriting of that amendment. If the Senator will turn to page 2, where the present law is quoted, he will discover that this is the test:

> And shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by the common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered.

I have not sought to change the law more than was necessary to reach my point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has that language received a construction by the courts holding that it continues the same degree of liability?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not remember any case in which it has been construed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask the question because unquestionably at common law the carrier of freight is liable for damage to freight while in its possession not caused by the carrier at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that, but I have not attempted to rewrite the whole law relating to the liability of a common carrier. I have taken the law as it is and have attempted to reach just one point. If others desire to change the law in other respects, I shall not oppose the change.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to suggest to the Senator the change of the word "caused" to "transported," so that instead of reading "to such property caused by it" it will read "to such property transported by it."

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing that that amendment shall be made. I think it would help the law.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am in full sympathy with all the Senator is seeking to do, and in perfect accord with his effort to pass this measure. I have felt for some time that it ought to be passed.

Mr. CUMMINS. In so far as I can I shall be glad to accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I realize its importance, and I hope we will all help to see that the Senator gets a vote upon it at this session of Congress and at as early a date as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on reconsidering the vote whereby the amendment commencing on line 11, page 3, was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment to the amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 12, page 3, it is proposed to strike out the word "caused" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "transported."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia has accurately stated the rule of the common law, that the common carrier was liable as an insurer. Of course there were exceptions to that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I stated the exceptions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not recall whether the Senator did or not; but at all events there are exceptions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I mentioned the five exceptions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not observe the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator simply did not hear me I added the five exceptions in my statement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator's amendment should be adopted, would not the effect of it be to broaden the liability of the carrier beyond the common-law liability, and to make it liable even though the loss might be occasioned by the public enemy or by the act of God?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I answer that question? I do not think it would, because the purpose of this bill is to leave the liability of the carrier untouched and unaffected by any agreement for limitation growing out of a representation or agreement as to value. I do not think it will broaden the rule to which the Senator from Utah has referred. That is to say, it will not make the common carrier liable for the act of God or the public enemy.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I had already suggested to the Senator from Iowa that I feared the language of the Carmack amendment, as well as the language of this bill, which limits the cases where the carrier shall be liable to those where the damage is caused by it, is too narrow; but I am afraid the language which the Senator from Georgia desires to write into the bill, if adopted, would be too broad. I think what we want to do here is to assert the common-law liability of the carrier. That is the purpose of the bill, as I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; that is not the purpose of the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator desire to make the railroad company more than an insurer of the goods?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is what I thought.

Mr. CUMMINS. But under the common law, as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, there can be a limitation upon the amount of recovery upon a statement of value. I want to get rid of that part of the common law, but not the part of the common law to which the Senator from Utah has just referred, namely, that the common carrier shall not be liable in the event of injuries caused by the act of Providence or the public enemy. I do not care to increase the liability of the carrier so far as that part of the law is concerned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was my understanding. I think the common carrier ought to be made liable as an insurer of the goods precisely as it was liable at common law. I do not think there ought to be any limitation upon that liability. The only question in my mind is——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me finish, if the Senator will pardon me. The only question in my mind is whether the introduction of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia will not do more than that.

I wish to make another suggestion, also. The Senator from Georgia suggests that we write in place of the words "caused by it" the words "transported by it." If that is done, the section will then read:

> That any common carrier * * * shall be liable to the lawful holder of such receipt or bill of lading for the full actual loss, damage, or injury to such property transported by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass.

That makes the initial company not only responsible for the loss that may be occasioned, as I view it, by the acts of God or the public enemy while the property is in the hands of the initial carrier, but also liable for the same sort of loss while the goods are in the hands of some connecting company. I think if we should write into the law, instead of "caused by it," the words "suffered by it," or some such language as that it probably would cover what all of us desire.

Mr. CUMMINS. "Suffered?"

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Instead of "caused by it."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we shall not be able to act on this bill before 1 o'clock. That is perfectly evident. I suggest, therefore, that the amendment I have proposed be passed over until to-morrow without action.

My desire is to do just what the Senator from Utah indicated that he thought it was my desire to do. I do not wish to carry it any further on one side than I was afraid the language of the bill might carry it on the other side. I believe if we think it over we can put in language about which there will be no possible doubt.

I understand that the Senator from Iowa used just the language of the Carmack amendment; but now that we have the subject up, I think it would be well to put in language about which there could be no possible question. The Senator from Iowa has given us all a clear insight into the bill and just what are its purposes. We are in a position to look at it more critically to-night, and we can come back to-morrow or within a day or two, and if we have any suggestions that we think would help him perfect it, offer them. I believe there probably will be no opposition. I know of none. I do not think there ought to be any opposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Georgia is right. There is no difference between the Senator from Utah and myself. I do not desire to make the railroad companies liable under circumstances under which they are not now liable; but, being liable, I want to make them pay the full value of the articles for which they may be responsible.

I do not, however, agree with the Senator from Utah that the word "transported" would enlarge the liability of a common carrier, inasmuch as this bill does not purport or pretend to prescribe their liability in that respect, but only their liability with regard to contracts of limitation.

Mr. President, I feel very much obliged to the Senate for its courtesy this morning; and I intend to ask to-morrow morning if it can be done without undue interruption of the tolls bill, for a continuation of its consideration. Meanwhile I ask that my resolution may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Whenever that resolution comes up I think it can be clearly shown that it is out of order and in violation of the rules.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope the Senator will not take any time in pressing it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall not take a moment so long as I can get time for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I believe we all want to help the Senator to get a vote on his bill.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, if there is nothing else occupying the attention of the Senate, I ask that the Panama Canal tolls bill may be laid before the Senate, in order that the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] may address himself to that question.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, as a member of the Interoceanic Canals Committee it seems proper that I should state the reasons as to why I can not consistently favor the passage of the pending bill for the repeal of the tolls on coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal.

I supported the bill which is now a law on the statute book providing for free tolls for ships of American register engaged in coastwise trade.

I also voted for the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, believing then as now that it could not in any way interfere with our domestic commerce or barter away any rights which have been imposed for more than a hundred years.

I have attended the hearings of this committee and patiently listened to the arguments of those advocating the repeal of a law which I believe is in the interest of American shipbuilding and American seamen, and up to the present time I fail to be convinced that the action of Congress in prohibiting the granting of free tolls to vessels engaged in domestic trade would be a good economic policy, and I know of no reason yet advanced which shows that we are morally or legally called upon to repeal a law which was duly enacted after a free discussion by Congress.

It seems that we have forgotten a well-known maxim to which we have paid reverence for a long time, "be sure you are right and then go ahead" and have adopted a new creed, "go ahead, no matter whether you are right or wrong."

From a nautical standpoint this would mean a very disastrous result to navigators, and the majority of ships now engaged in coastwise trade would be lying upon the rocks of the lee shore.

No prudent navigator would think of adopting such a new regulation, for it is an elementary law that the cautious mariner keeps well in mind the three L's—that is, a sharp lookout, attention to the log showing the distance run, and the lead line showing the depth of the water under the vessel's keel.

I know of no reason why our country should depart from such a prudent course and enter upon an uncharted sea, in which are sunken rocks, thereby escaping the Scylla only to fall prey to Charybdis.

COMMERCE OF THE CANAL.

The trade in the Panama Canal will fall into three grand divisions, each sharply defined by its nature and by principles of regulation which are well understood and of general application among maritime nations.

It seems to me that an examination of these three divisions of trade will contribute to a clearer understanding of the duty of the Senate in the situation which is presented by the pending bill.

1. With the completion of the canal a new and better trade route will be opened between the nations of Europe and the nations of the west coast of North and South America; between the nations of Europe and Japan and part of the coasts of China, at least as far south as Shanghai; and particularly for Great Britain with the west coast of British North America, with New Zealand, and with British possessions scattered throughout the Pacific Ocean.

2. We confidently expect as a result of the canal a large increase in the trade between the Atlantic ports of the United States with ports of the west coast of Central and South America, of Asia, and with the islands of the Pacific, and also increased trade between our ports on the Pacific and all the countries of the Old World, with possibilities of commerce between these ports and the eastern coast of South America.

3. We are assured that the interchange of commodities between our own Pacific Coast States, our Gulf States, and the States of the Atlantic, and of the States which do not lie directly on the seaboard, will receive a great impetus from the reduction in rates of transportation made possible by the substitution of water routes for all-rail routes and the greater economies of water transportation.

COMMERCIAL ADVANTAGES TO FOREIGN NATIONS.

With the benefits to commerce which will accrue from the increased facilities for transportation between foreign nations we have no direct commercial concern.

We can contemplate with satisfaction the growth of trade between Chile and Peru, on the one side, and, on the other, England, Germany, and France, and the States of the Mediterranean, without envy and with the complacency with which all right-thinking men view the welfare and prosperity of others, in whatever part of the world it may be.

We certainly are not troubled by the fact that while nations are striving, each by all the means in its power, to develop its own foreign trade at the possible expense of other nations, we on our part have contributed to the growth of an international commerce in which we not only have no share ourselves but which possibly might have been diverted to our own shores had we been less generous and listened to the promptings of self-interest.

ESTIMATED TONNAGE.

The tonnage passing through the canal during the first or second year of its full operation has been roughly estimated at 10,000,000 net tons of shipping, and of this total it is estimated that practically 60 per cent will be of vessels going to and from foreign ports and never during the course of the voyage approaching nearer to the United States than the gateways of the canal.

I do not wish to be vainglorious or boasting, but I recall no instance in history where a nation has been so generous in its treatment of commercial rivals as has the United States in its prosecution of the work of the Panama Canal and in its plans for the future operation of the canal.

We have spent, or shall before long have spent, in the construction and early years of operation of the canal the sum of about $400,000,000.

There can be no question of doubt that the canal would not have been built—certainly in our time—had not the Government of the United States assumed the burden.

The task has been colossal, and could have been carried to success only by a great power; and this fact is appreciated nowhere else, I venture to say, more thoroughly than at the great maritime centers of the Old World.

THE CANAL NOT A MONEY MAKER.

The canal, too, from its very nature, can not be a money-making enterprise, and in this respect it must be sharply distinguished from the other similar great trade route, the Suez Canal.

The acquisition of the majority of shares of the Suez Canal by the British Government was rightly considered one of the great triumphs of Lord Beaconsfield's diplomacy—not merely for the political interests which it gave England in the canal and in the future of Egypt, but also because it was a good investment. A sure return of about 20 per cent per annum with a necessary trade route between Europe and Asia as security, the neutrality of which is guaranteed by the great powers of Europe, I need scarcely say is a particularly sagacious investment.

All the conditions of our investment in the Panama Canal make it perfectly clear that long before we shall be able to meet running expenses and set apart even a modest 1 or 2 per cent as a sinking fund to liquidate the first cost of the canal, we shall be compelled to incur still further expenditures in lowering the level at the time we increase the length and width of the locks. The rate of tolls which has already been fixed is necessarily a competitive rate determined by the rate which obtains at the Suez Canal, and even the most sanguine do not anticipate that the receipts will soon meet the necessary expenses, including those of sanitation, the military garrison, and charges entailed by the free transit of our own warships. We have voluntarily placed ourselves in a position where we propose to tax our own people annually for years to come to promote the trade between the nations of Europe on the one hand and the west coast of South America, Asia, and the islands of the Pacific on the other. If there be another such instance of commercial altruism in history I do not recall it, and if in this instance there be any discrimination, surely our discrimination has not been in our favor. Bear in mind, too, that the division of trade of which I am now speaking—the trade through the canal strictly between foreign countries in which the United States is to have no share itself—comprises more than half of the anticipated canal traffic.

WHICH OF THE NATIONS PROTEST?

With these indisputable facts before them, which of the nations of the world protests that we have been unfair and are seeking for ourselves selfish gain from a project which from its very inception in the time of Henry Clay we have all proclaimed should be for the benefit of mankind? Certainly not the ally of our earlier years as a nation struggling for independence, our old-time friend, France. The work which she undertook on the Isthmus and failed to carry through we have assumed and brought to the verge of successful completion.

Where Ferdinand de Lesseps—disheartened by lack of funds, by want of popular confidence, by the ravages of disease, and by stupendous engineering obstacles—was forced to surrender, there the work was taken up, backed by the unlimited resources of the Government of the United States, protected by sanitary conditions the best which modern medical science could devise, and directed by as fine a body of engineers as was ever assembled, and carried to completion by Col. George W. Goethals.

It seems to me that the French Republic should hesitate before protesting against our action, and if there be any such protest it certainly has not come to my knowledge, whatever may be the knowledge in the possession of other Members of the Senate.

Can it be possible that a protest has come from Germany, keen to push her commerce to all parts of the world and already a formidable competitor with England for the commercial mastery of the seas?

German maritime enterprise has already established its steamship lines all around the two Americas and the canal. To these German lines, by economy of time and coal and all the factors of expense dependent thereon, the canal offers the opportunity for a large expansion of trade that will add to the prestige of the German merchant flag. If there has been any protest from the German Government or from the German steamship lines against our legislation, it has not, so far as I am aware, come to the notice of the Senate.

GREAT BRITAIN PROTESTS.

The only protest from foreign Governments of which the Senate has knowledge is the protest of the British Government, and British ships do more than half of the world's ocean carrying trade.

It has been intimated during the discussions on the pending bill that the British protest and this measure had their origin in the notion that in some way or other our good neighbor to the north, the Dominion of Canada, and particularly the great Provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, and Saskatchewan, of the Pacific hinterland, would be adversely affected by free tolls for American ships in the coastwise trade.

ADVANTAGES OF THE CANAL TO CANADA.

Senators may be surprised at the statement that for last year the gain to the farmers of Alberta alone in diminished freight rates, had the Panama Canal been open to trade, would have amounted to $20,000,000, and that in the not remote future, for which harbor and dock facilities are already being completed by our northern friends, the canal will be a free gift to the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan estimated at $200,000,000 a year. These estimates are not mine, nor do I envy the Dominion the great period of development which awaits her to the north of my home on the Pacific.

I mention these facts as a reason for my reluctance to believe that the people of Canada put forth any claim that in the construction of the Panama Canal and the legislation to provide for its administration the Congress of the United States has not acted fairly and with a liberality of which it is hard to find any parallel.

The figures I have given are from an address delivered in London less than a month ago before the members of the Royal Colonial Institute, in the formation of which the late Cecil Rhodes and other British Empire builders participated in order to create an agency for the promotion of imperial policies.

"In urging upon the institute the important work being carried out by the Vancouver Dock Extension Co., with its proposed 25 miles of docks and 14 square miles of area, connecting with every great railroad coming into Vancouver and every steamship sailing from that port, Mr. F. B. Vrooman, a well-known authority on the commercial and industrial development of Canada, said that so profound was the change to be wrought in Canada that the Panama Canal was already throwing up across the Dominion a new economical divide. This meant that soon the movements on the new Pacific would draw two-thirds of the surplus resources of the Dominion toward it.

"Two-thirds of the future products of Canada were destined to be tributary to the western sea. The all-rail transcontinental haul for the products of western Canada would soon be a thing of the past. Were the capacity of the railroads equal to Canada's growing needs, the single element of cost would be enough to drive so much of Canada's traffic from eastward to westward that it would change the economic equilibrium of Canada itself.

"It must be remembered that the actual cash value of the Panama Canal to the prairie farmer of Canada accrues not only to the export grain—indeed, not to grain alone—but to every commodity, export or import, of mine, factory, forest, and farm, whose cost of freight into or out of or within the country would be reduced by the Panama highway.

WEST CANADIAN GRAIN RATES LOWERED.

"Grain rates from Vancouver to Liverpool via Panama would be less than half the rate from Albertan points to Vancouver.

"What did this mean? It meant that the Panama Canal would put an Alberta farmer in the summer about 7 cents a bushel nearer Liverpool, and in the winter 15 cents a bushel nearer Liverpool. Average this, and state it in round numbers, and it meant that the Panama Canal henceforth would add 10 cents a bushel to the value of every bushel of grain to be grown in Alberta. They could approximate the saving for the western half of Saskatchewan at 4 cents, and that for Alberta at 10 cents the year round. They had in all of Alberta and half of Saskatchewan something like 300,000,000 bushels of grain. Bring one train an hour into Vancouver and it would take two years to bring the grain crop of 1912 from all of Alberta and half of Saskatchewan to the docks of Vancouver.

"It was needless to say that it would take very different dock and harbor facilities in Vancouver from what they have there now to handle even 5 per cent of the grain traffic, to say nothing of the other export products and the volume of trade due from the new Pacific to the Canadian continent.

"Let them look ahead to the time when 60 per cent instead of 6 per cent of Alberta and Saskatchewan was under crop. That time was not far distant. That time must be provided for by railway facilities through the continent and by dock and harbor facilities at the port of transshipment. If Alberta and Saskatchewan produced, at a round estimate, 130,000,000 bushels of wheat alone in 1913, all of which would lie well on the Pacific economic slope, such a time as he referred to would easily see 1,300,000,000 bushels of wheat per annum. They would have 60,000 trainloads of wheat to get into the elevators of Vancouver and to transport again on Pacific ships. Bringing in a train every 30 minutes, it would take four years to get one year's crop into Vancouver and unload it, and they would have waiting around somewhere on the side tracks something like 800 trains more for the next year. In other words, to handle such a crop it would require railway and terminal facilities for a trainload of wheat about every 7 minutes in the elevators and docks of Vancouver.

"It meant that had the canal been finished and had there been proper dock and harbor facilities at Vancouver to handle it this canal would have given a clear gain to the farmers of Alberta alone of about £4,000,000 on the crop of 1912. It was easy to see not far hence for the farmers of Alberta and Saskatchewan a free gift from this canal of something in the neighborhood of £50,000,000 a year in freight rates saved."

ANTICIPATED TRAFFIC OF THE CANAL.

In stating that more than half of the anticipated traffic of the Panama Canal would be trade strictly between foreign countries in which the United States is to have no share, I had in mind especially the exchange of imports and exports between nations by which nations parties to the exchange thrive; by which their lines of productive activity give employment to their labor and capital, increase and prosperity to their inhabitants, with all the gain in moral, mental, and physical well-being which comes to a nation whose people are steadily and happily employed—I had these things in mind at the moment rather than the carrying trade—the ships by which this exchange is effected and the national colors which those ships will display. To my regret, in the carrying trade to be opened by the Panama Canal between the west coast of South America, for example, and the Continent of Europe, the United States will also have no part. The lion's share of that carrying trade, under existing conditions, will be conducted by British ships.

I do not intend to burden the Senate with any statistics, nor is it my purpose to quote from the voluminous correspondence relating to the Panama Canal. In the many able speeches which have been made in both branches of Congress, and from all points of view during the discussion of the last few years, such information has already been fully set forth, and I could merely add one more interpretation or construction of official correspondence to the many already before the Senate. I would, however, ask your attention to one very simple computation. The first cost of the canal with its accessories and of operation during its first year will be in the neighborhood of $400,000,000.

Over one-half of the anticipated trade through the canal will be, as I have stated, trade strictly between foreign countries, in which the United States is to have no share. So, over $200,000,000 of our investment we may set down to pure philanthropy from the strictly commercial point of view. Of this trade between foreign nations one-half, at least, and probably more, will be carried on in British ships, so that of our outlay of $400,000,000, the immediate and undisputable beneficiary, at least to the extent of $100,000,000, will be ships under the red ensign.

I wish here and now distinctly to disclaim any hostility against England or any desire to bring into this discussion any considerations which in any way would violate the warning of Washington, in his Farewell Address, against "permanent inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others."

In all our differences and discussions with England which have come under my notice—the Alaska boundary controversy, also fisheries limitation treaties and other treaties covering disputed questions, and as a Member of the Senate, and especially as a member of the committees which have had to deal with these differences and disputes—I have found the representatives of the British Government fair men, moderate in the presentation of the views of their Government and animated by the desire to secure an amicable and just settlement of differences which necessarily from time to time arise in the relations of neighboring nations.

IMMEDIATE GAIN TO GREAT BRITAIN OF $100,000,000.

The immediate beneficiary of $100,000,000 of our investment will be British ships engaged through the canal in trade between countries foreign to us.

In 1875 Great Britain paid £4,000,000, say $20,000,000, for its immense block of shares in the Suez Canal, which up to that time had cost much less than $100,000,000. It does not seem to me, therefore, quite in accord with the fitness of things that the British Government should allege undue discrimination on the part of the United States in its own favor in the legislation which we have enacted.

I have, of course, read the notes in which the British Government has expressed its views, and I find in them none of the vehement denunciation, none of the imputations of bad faith and national dishonor, no trace of the passionate insistence that one side in this controversy is altogether right and the other side is altogether wrong which have characterized the discussion on the subject at times in Congress, and even more the discussions in the public press. I find in these notes a candid, straightforward recognition of the fact that there is a difference of opinion as to the construction in actual administration to be put upon certain phrases in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

We have all along been aware of such differences, and it seems to me that we should be very cautious before we put ourselves irretrievably in the attitude of affirming that we are altogether right or altogether wrong.

In the general division of the Panama Canal trade which we have thus far considered—namely, the exchange of imports and exports exclusively between foreign nations, carried exclusively in foreign ships, and constituting, as estimated, over one-half of the business of the canal—we have more than met all the obligations of the broadest humanity.

THE UNITED STATES HAS PUT $400,000,000 IN THE CANAL.

We have invested over $400,000,000 for that purpose, and we have fixed a rate of tolls so low as to fall short of the estimated expenses of operating the canal and all its appurtenances, the maintenance of the necessary armed force, and proper sanitation, without any provision for a sinking fund to meet the original obligation.

This is a splendid gift to mankind.

COMMERCIAL ADVANTAGES.

The second great division of trade through the canal will be the trade between the Atlantic and Gulf ports of the United States and foreign ports in the Pacific Ocean, and trade between the ports of our Pacific States, Alaska, and Hawaii and foreign ports on the Atlantic.

This trade has been roughly computed at about 35 per cent of the anticipated trade through the canal, measured by the tonnage of ships passing through the locks.

In all the benefits that accrue from the exchange of imports and exports between nations the United States will share so far as this branch of trade is concerned. And how has the canal legislation treated it? On terms of absolute equality with no discrimination as between other nations or as between other nations and ourselves. Congress, in enacting the canal legislation, has treated this branch of trade precisely in accord with the principle of maritime reciprocity which has been the guiding principle of our commercial and maritime policy for a hundred years and is identical with the maritime policy of the world.

THE TARIFF IN RELATION TO THE CANAL.

This is not the time to enter into a discussion of the merits or demerits of the policy of discriminating duties, imposts, or other charges, but I can not refrain from suggesting that the paragraph in the recent tariff act proposing a discriminating reduction in the duties on cargoes brought in American ships furnished much better ground for protest than does the Panama Canal act of 1912, and that a rare opportunity to affirm the sanctity of treaty obligations was lost when the House of Representatives passed unhindered a section so plainly in violation of treaty obligations that the Senate with little discussion speedily sought to correct it.

Subsection 7 of paragraph J of section 4 of the Underwood-Simmons tariff provides:

> J. Subsection 7. That a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall be construed as to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of any treaty concluded between the United States and any foreign nation.

Unlike the Panama Canal legislation which is under review in the present discussion, this section of the tariff law owes its existence entirely to the responsible political majority in both branches of Congress and to the national administration which was consulted in the preparation of the Underwood tariff. I presume that the subsection was intended to be a fulfillment of the following plank in the Democratic national platform:

> Merchant marine: We believe in fostering by constitutional regulation of commerce the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics to the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

Whether this plank is a "little plank" or a big plank, whether its meaning was understood at the time or was not understood by those who voted for it, and whether it will be necessary to take another poll of the delegates to the Baltimore convention to find out whether this plank should be lived up to or abandoned, I am not in a position to state. This much, however, is a matter of public knowledge. The Attorney General has held that the subsection consists of mere words—of sound and nothing further. In brief his ruling is:

> The 5 per cent discount to American vessels only, which was the primary object of the subsection, can not be given without impairing the stipulation of existing treaties between the United States and various other powers, and consequently the subsection, by the express terms of the proviso, is inoperative.

The Secretary of the Treasury, accordingly, has declined to enforce this part of the act.

The Board of United States General Appraisers, which is equally with the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General a part of the responsible administration and is charged, I believe, specifically with the administrative decision of matters relating to the tariff, over a month ago decided as follows:

> We conclude that subsection 7 of paragraph J of section 4, tariff act of 1913, should be enforced according to its letter.
> That dutiable goods imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States should be conceded a 5 per cent discount from the duties provided for in the other parts of the statute.
> That the most-favored-nation clauses in treaties with foreign countries are not applicable to the questions at issue here, as subsection 7 does not extend any special favor to any particular country, but is an offer or promise by the United States to importers, wherever residing, for the benefit of American shipping, with incidental benefits to the importer; that it is not gratuitously given in any sense of the word, but is in consideration of the necessary trouble and expense incumbent upon the shipper who selects American vessels, and the enforcement of the law does not abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of any treaty.
> That the more specific commercial treaties here in question are not self-executing; they are executory; and the question of their application is a political one and not within the jurisdiction of the courts.

There can be no doubt whatever that should this ruling of the Board of General Appraisers be enforced by the Treasury Department protests of discrimination would be filed by all the great maritime nations with which we are in treaty relations.

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The subject covered by this paragraph of the tariff has to do exclusively with foreign trade and foreign relations. I am at a loss to understand, therefore, why those who are keen for our scrupulous regard for our international promises—and in that regard I yield to no one—should have begun with a matter involving solely our coastwise trade, which to the minds of many of us appears to be a purely domestic concern. Before them is a larger matter of foreign trade involving indisputably our commercial relations with foreign powers which have been regulated for nearly a hundred years by treaty in accord with a uniform policy of maritime reciprocity. This issue is squarely before the national administration and the responsible majority in Congress. Has Congress been asked to repeal this section? Has a choice been made between the attitude of one part of the administration that the section is an empty and meaningless jumble of words put forth in the hope that it would delude men into the belief that the Baltimore convention platform had been fulfilled, and the attitude of another part of the administration that we are at entire liberty in the face of 30 treaties to discriminate in favor of American ships "in consideration of the necessary trouble and expense incumbent upon the shipper who selects American vessels"?

THE BALTIMORE PLATFORM.

I have profound respect for the President of the United States and for the Senators who are ably supporting his views and reaffirming their own views on the subject of the Panama Canal toll legislation, enacted with the approval of the last national administration, but I must confess that they seem to me to be "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel" so long as the discriminating duty provision in subsection 7 of paragraph J of section 4 of the Underwood tariff remains on the statute books. If that section is a jumble of words, let it be repealed and take its place with the other discarded lumber of the Baltimore platform. If, on the other hand, the section is real, vital law, "fostering by constitutional regulation of commerce the growth of a merchant marine," then let it be enforced. If it is not enforced because the administration believes that its enforcement would violate 20 treaties or more, and with real reason give offense to those nations with whom we wish to maintain friendly intercourse, then let us have a frank avowal of the fact, and a prompt repeal of the subsection would follow without admonition from the President. At all events, it strikes me that it would be more seemly before we remove the "mote" in the Panama Canal act of 1912 to extract the "beam" from the Underwood-Simmons tariff measure.

THE DISAPPEARING AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Sixty-one years ago, in the summer of 1853, I was a sailor boy at $7 a month on board the square-rigged American ship Golden Eagle, loaded with cotton from New Orleans, in the harbor of Havre, France.

The Golden Eagle was built at Kennebunkport, in my native State of Maine, and I can assure you she was a sailing ship of which the American of that day or of this might well have been proud. I recall that at that time there lay in that great French harbor docks 12 full-rigged American ships, loaded not only with the products of our own country, but some of them with the products of the remote parts of the world. There were but two British ships in the harbor at that time, and it is pleasant for me to recall that a favorite air of the military bands of this great French seaport was the Star-Spangled Banner, played in honor of the kind of ships and the sort of men with which the United States was conducting its commerce with our sister Republic. Before I was 18 years old I had made six voyages to Europe and one to California around Cape Horn on merchant ships flying the American flag. During my lifetime I have been closely identified with the American merchant marine in every capacity from that of a cabin boy and seaman on the sailing ships of years ago to a part owner in a considerable fleet of American steamships on the Pacific coast.

Lest some one outside the walls of the Senate Chamber may think that in my words and vote on this bill I am moved by personal interests, I take the liberty of stating that before I came to Congress, 21 years ago, I divorced myself from all business interests which could in any way be affected by congressional legislation, excepting that general legislation which relates to the whole country. My interest in the subject of the merchant marine, however, is unabated. In my own experience I have come to realize the value of a merchant marine in the promotion of foreign trade, and more particularly its inestimable value to the Nation as an element of the national defense in time of war.

THE LOYALTY OF THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

In every war in which the United States has participated during my lifetime the American merchant marine, ships and sailors, have filled an honorable and necessary part, and it is with profound regret and sorrow that from time to time during the discussion of the pending bill I have heard shipowners denounced in terms which in my young manhood would not have been applied to the most hardened lawbreaker.

I have heard men denounced as parasites and leeches on the Public Treasury whom we all know risk their capital and devote their best energies of mind and body to the prosecution of ventures on the sea which have helped to give us the commerce that renders profitable all form of industrial enterprise and labor at home. To these very men in time of emergency the Nation has always turned first for help and met with prompt and generous response.

I have seen the time when the United States was a close second to Great Britain—so close that the race was neck and neck between us for the title of "Mistress of the Seas."

I shall not enter into an examination at this time of the causes which for the past few decades have made us a laggard in the race and have transferred easily to our rival the title for which we once fairly competed. It was my national pride and glory then to see the American flag flying in foreign ports; but now, to my profound sorrow, our flag is now hardly found or seen in any foreign port.

I have seen it gradually disappear, first from the remote ports, then from those nearer at home, until to-day, as Senators are well aware, our flag is seldom seen abroad, and American ships are engaged almost exclusively in the coastwise trade.

COASTWISE TRADE RESERVED TO THE UNITED STATES UNDER OUR NAVIGATION LAWS.

The coastwise trade of the United States for a century has been reserved to American vessels. This fundamental principle of our economic system has been known to other maritime nations for generations. In fact, I doubt if we have any other rule of conduct which is so generally known abroad as is this rule. It is as well understood in London and Hamburg as in Washington that the carrying trade of the United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast can be conducted only in vessels of the United States, whether the route be around Cape Horn, through the Straits of Magellan, or through the Panama Canal.

The principle of the reservation of the coasting trade was established by the fathers of the Republic, Jefferson and Madison, as well as Franklin and Hamilton, and up to the present time the wisdom of that policy has not been disputed.

I now, however, note with regret that the author of the pending Panama Canal toll bill in the other branch of Congress has introduced a measure to open our coasting trade to foreign vessels, and it may perhaps be that the bill before us is the first step in a policy subversive of all our maritime traditions. The pending bill is certainly in conflict with one of our most firmly established commercial principles. I had always believed until the last few months that the unrestricted commerce between the States was a cardinal principle of our economic faith.

If I have read history correctly, the removal of charges upon and impediments to the navigation of the Potomac between the Colonies of Maryland and Virginia was one of the prime causes for the meeting of the Annapolis convention which was the first step toward the union of the Colonies, the Declaration of Independence, and the establishment of the United States of America.

Certainly for 30 years Congress has made it perfectly clear that—no tolls or operating charges whatever shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use and benefit of navigation, now belonging to the United States or that may hereafter be acquired or constructed.

There are none left in Congress of those who voted for this measure in 1884, but I venture the suggestion that the late John G. Carlisle, who presided over the House of Representatives which passed this measure, and the late Allen G. Thurman, who was a member of the Senate which concurred in enacting it—to call to the minds of our latter-day exponents of Democracy the names of only two leaders who really understood and lived up to the traditional principles of their party—it would be a surprise to these men, I say, could they be told, as we are being told, that freedom of navigation between the States is another name for wholesale subsidy to shipping and is inconsistent with the principles of the Democratic Party.

The great State of New York a generation ago abolished the tolls on the Erie Canal, and a few years ago voted upwards of a hundred million dollars for the improvement of that waterway. Would anything be more fantastic—to use no stronger word—than to assert seriously that by these two great acts of her people and her legislature the State of New York aimed to give subsidies to the owners and captains of her canal boats and to raid the State treasury and rob the people for the benefit of the few who chanced to have put their money in these humble craft?

FREE TOLLS NOT A SUBSIDY.

The passage of American ships in commerce between the States from New York to San Francisco through the Panama Canal free of tolls is no more a subsidy, to my way of thinking, than the passage of less pretentious vessels from New York to Cleveland or Chicago free of tolls through the Erie Canal.

The fundamental rule in each case is the same, that the commerce between the States by right ought to be free from Federal taxation or charges, save only when the necessities of war require Congress to push the taxing power to its furthermost limits

This well-established principle of freedom of intercourse between the States has been challenged during the discussion of the pending measure, and I am not certain that the responsible majority in its desire to do things differently from the way in which they always have been done will not use the pending bill as the first step in the policy of erecting national tollgates on all navigable rivers and canals which have received the favorable attention of Congress.

The charge of subsidy to shipping business seems to me without force or effect for the reason that there is no single track between any of the ports of the United States bordering on the ocean, and anyone can build and operate a vessel without restriction, engage in the coastwise and ocean trade, and go where he pleases.

If it is called a subsidy by the shipping interests, then it seems to me equally fallacious as vessels that are built in American shipyards, by American mechanics who are citizens of this country or capable of becoming, give the profits to the American people rather than to foreign people; also money expended in this country for labor and raw material used in the construction of American ships help to build up the industries of this country rather than foreign industrial activity.

These ships in this country also pay a city, county, and State tax, and assessments in some form are levied by most States on this kind of property, New York being the exception by exempting American vessels engaged in domestic and foreign trade from direct taxation as property.

Wages paid to sailors and officers on ships flying the American flag are nearly double those paid on foreign ships. For the same reason, because of higher wages paid to American mechanics, the cost of building a ship in this country is approximately one-third more than anywhere else in the world.

Of course, ships flying under foreign colors pay nothing to this country in the way of taxes, and come from foreign ports to the ports of the United States, and in no way help to decrease the burden of taxation of this country.

The charge that this subsidy is a huge monopoly and trust in vessels engaged in the coastwise trade by those advocating the repeal of free tolls shows that they have given but little consideration to this measure, for the reason that railroads which have a monopoly have paid by far a better rate of interest on investments than companies who have shipping interests and who have paid but a fair rate on the capital invested, the hazard of loss being very great.

I have endeavored to show how meaningless is the use of the word "subsidy" in the discussion of the bill before us, but that word has no terrors for me or for the people of the State of California, whose future lies on the sea.

The policy of subsidies is consistently followed by the maritime nations of the world mainly for military and postal services, and I have no doubt in time that the United States will give up its rule of isolation and singularity in this respect, just as it changed its policy about 30 years ago and started to become a first-class naval power.

As an American, and especially interested in navigation and anything pertaining to industrial pursuits, I think that anyone giving this question the necessary attenton and study will agree with me that the coastwise trade should be kept open and unrestricted to the people of our country.

I am sure the Senators who are supporting the pending bill will give respectful consideration to the recent report of the British Board of Trade to the British Parliament, showing the following subventions paid to merchant ships:

EXEMPTING COASTWISE VESSELS NO DISCRIMINATION AGAINST ANY NATION.

I have endeavored to show that the opponents of this bill occupy a position fortified at every point by recognized principles of American policy, including the policy of extreme liberality in the commercial treatment of other maritime nations, while the advocates of the bill, starting with the rejection of the most recent declarations of the three national parties and their national leaders during the last presidential election, are already driven to advocate measures and theories subversive of those which have been consistently followed from the beginning of our Government.

There is no question in my mind that the Panama Canal act of 1912, by exempting our coastwise vessels from Panama Canal tolls, involved no discrimination of any kind against Great Britain or any other nation.

I well recall that during the discussion of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in executive session the late William P. Frye, Senator from the State of Maine, than whom the Senate has never seen a more just and impartial counsellor in our foreign relations and a more devoted advocate of the merchant marine—I recall, I say, that Senator Frye in executive session distinctly took the view that the proposed amendment of my colleague, Senator Bard, of California, to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by specifically exempting our coastwise trade in terms in the treaty was entirely unnecessary, though perhaps harmless, because foreign ships could not engage in the coasting trade from the Atlantic to the Pacific either through the Straits of Magellan or through the transisthmian canal when opened; that the question of discrimination accordingly could never arise, because this rule of our maritime conduct was as well understood abroad as at home.

THE MEANING OF THE BRITISH PROTEST.

The British protest, as I read it, takes no other or different view. It merely expresses the fear that the principle of coastwise exemption may be so administered as to lead to discrimination against British vessels in contravention of the treaty. This fear does not involve national honor; it is not a charge of perfidy against the Congress which passed and the President who signed the Panama Canal act of 1912; it does not intimate that the national platforms and the national candidates of 1912 were lost to all sense of propriety and all understanding of the solemnity of international obligations.

This expression was merely a reasonable admonition that in the administration of the canal act officers responsible for government shall see to it that all the rights we have conceded to other nations shall be scrupulously observed and shall not be lost sight of by those charged with the control of the canal.

I must confess that the fear expressed by Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Mitchell Innes, of the British embassy, would have seemed to me more reasonable if it had been uttered after instead of before the action of the officers of the administration with reference to the discriminating-duty section of the Underwood Tariff Act.

Be that as it may, if I have read with understanding the British notes, the remedy for the situation lies in careful instructions by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of Commerce, in their respective spheres, to subordinate officers in their several departments who have to do with Panama Canal affairs and the duties of collectors of customs.

Until this remedy has been tried; until some reasonable proposition for arbitration or mediation, if there be any question to arbitrate or mediate, has been tried and has failed, the Senate should hesitate long before taking a step the ultimate consequences of which may be fraught with serious perils to the Republic.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand that there is no Senator who desires to discuss the tolls question at this time. If there is, I will give way; but if there is not, I desire, under the protection of this measure while it is before the Senate, to perform the modest task of making a few suggestions to the President of the United States and to the Democratic Party.

It appears by the public press that we are to have no legislation at this session upon western questions, and I feel that I may properly appeal to those in charge of legislation to consider seriously the question whether such legislation should be put aside. We have been in session now for nearly two years. Some measures covering western legislation vital to the interests of the West have already been put into shape and form and passed by this body, which could be passed by the other body and become the law of the land after a few hours' consideration.

A short time, Mr. President, after the incumbent of the White House was elected he delivered an address at Chicago upon the subject of conservation, an address which met with the approval of the entire West. In the first place, it was a clear and definite statement as to the necessity of some practical legislation, and, in the second place, it seemed to suggest that legislation along practical, sane, and safe lines. As I have said, it met with the approval of all those who live in what is known as the arid-land or public-land States, or those States which are yet in the course of development where there are large areas of public lands and where the natural resources are yet to be developed. I took occasion to write the President after he delivered that address, expressing, as an humble member of the western delegation, my approval of the principles which he announced and the purposes which he foreshadowed as to his administration.

The President followed up the address, as an evidence of his good faith, by appointing as Secretary of the Interior, Franklin K. Lane, than whom no better man could have been found for the position, a western man, but thoroughly alive to the necessity of protecting the natural resources of the West against the inroads of monopoly, a man who understands the necessity of development and the pressing need of legislation in order to promote development; in other words, a man who believes that the tying up of natural resources is not conservation. There are only a few people in this country at large who still believe in that proposition.

Mr. Lane made his report on June 30, 1913, in which he outlined the purposes and policies of the administration. This report met with the entire approval of the people of the West, and it was supposed that legislation would follow within a reasonable time and that relief would be granted from a condition which can not be too thoroughly discussed or too well understood.

As I have said, so far as actual legislation is concerned, nothing up to this time has been done and the situation in some respects is deplorable. I do not believe that the President understands the situation in the West or the conditions which prevail there at this time. Neither do I believe that he understands the situation here with reference to legislation upon that subject; or, otherwise, there would be an insistence upon his part that some legislation be enacted at this session.

I understand, Mr. President, that there are some kinds of legislation, or, rather, some bills covering some subjects of conservation, which would require a vast amount of time; and perhaps, in view of other matters which are pending and which are deemed to be more important—though I do not think so—we can not expect that legislation be had upon those subjects. For instance, we might concede that, so far as legislation dealing with the grazing lands in the West is concerned, that it could hardly be framed, put into shape, and passed at this session. We might concede that, so far as the power question is concerned, it would require more time than we could possibly give to it at this session; but I do want to say, Mr. President, that there is no subject before Congress of more concern and consequence, not only to the people of the West but to the entire country, than the question of the proper solution of the power problem.

There is now in process of organization and creation in this country the most gigantic combination designed to control the power possibilities of this country that we have had any knowledge of in the entire history of combinations. Men representing $300,000,000 are behind the movement to take control; and the attitude which the Government has assumed for the last few years enables them to do so with greater prospect of success. I would not say that a law dealing with that question could be passed at this session, requiring the consideration and study that it will, but I do say that we could well afford to spend time upon the subject and, in my judgment, some other matters which will be dealt with in a superficial way could be put aside for the purpose of dealing with this matter in a substantial way.

I do not, however, rise to urge those two particular propositions. There are some measures here which we can enact after a few hours' consideration. They are measures which have been discussed. They have been hammered into shape. Committees from the House of Representatives and from the Senate, in connection with the Secretary of the Interior, have gone over them and worked them out. Some of them have passed this body, and it would only require a few hours to make them statutes; and the result would be of incalculable benefit to the people of the West, who are trying to settle up the arid lands and make homes there. Those people have disclosed great courage, a great love for homes, in taking hold of these desert lands, and we owe a duty to them, and that is to act promptly and to act efficiently.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANSDELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator referred to the conduct of the administration as having placed it in the power of these water-power monopolies to get control; and I think the Senator limited this administrative policy to the last two years, or possibly three years.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; I did not limit it to that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator did not intend to convey that idea. It really dates back six or eight years.

Mr. BORAH. I did not limit it to the last two years. I said "the last few years."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not think the Senator intended to do so.

Mr. BORAH. I did not rise to-day to assail the administration or to criticize it. I am calling attention to a condition. Wherever the chips fall they will have to fall, whether on preceding administrations or on this administration.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not think the Senator intended to convey that idea, but from what the Senator said I rather drew the inference that he confined it to the last two or three years. I think the policy of which he speaks really dates back about eight years.

Mr. BORAH. I did not intend to confine it to this administration. I said "the last few years."

I was about to say that there are some measures here which need not take any considerable length of time. We passed through this body some time ago an act providing for the extension of the period of time for payment upon reclamation projects. That was a measure which was earnestly recommended by the Secretary of the Interior in his exceptionally able report, to which I have already called attention heretofore in a former debate; but I want to read, if I may, a single paragraph from it. It says:

But there is one matter of great moment to these people which should be corrected by law as soon as possible.

Of course, as we do business here, and as the Government moves upon a century plan, it might be said that a year or two years or five years is "as soon as possible"; but for the man who is out upon the homestead, whose credit has been exhausted, whose title is likely to be impeached, and whose financial condition is up to the limit, "as soon as possible" does not mean a year or two. It means within a few months, or it means the forfeiture of his title and the loss of his earnings for the last five or six years. Yet, Mr. President, what the Secretary of the Interior says should be taken care of as soon as possible has been lying here in the tomb of legislation for months and months, and during all that time men have been sacrificing what has really constituted their earnings for the last several years.

I know that since the Congress of the United States has ceased to be at all active upon this question more than one homesteader in my State upon these reclamation projects has given up his all, and has undertaken to find employment at day labor or something to take care of his family.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to inquire of the Senator if he does not think the Senate is in part to blame for this condition? Do we not waste more than half our time here in idle and useless discussion which might easily be obviated, and the time devoted to giving attention to the public business?

Mr. KENYON. Did the Senator say half of our time?

Mr. THOMAS. I wanted to be as moderate as possible. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENYON. I thought the Senator's statement was rather moderate.

Mr. BORAH. I will agree to that, if the Senator did not mean a personal reflection upon the present speaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS. On the contrary, I am quite as guilty as my colleagues of using up a good deal of time that might perhaps be devoted to useful purposes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think these bills could be passed without any further discussion at all, in all likelihood, and that if they were brought to the attention of the Congress they would be passed without any considerable further discussion, because they have been worked out to a great extent. They have been before committees; the Secretary of the Interior and his very able assistant have had to do with them, and there is very little left to discuss. I think they are agreeable to all parties interested, but for some inconceivable reason there is no movement behind them.

I will read another line or two from the report of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I simply wish to suggest in that connection that there certainly was not any unnecessary delay in the Senate in the passage of the bill to which the Senator has referred, and no particular discussion in regard to it. It was passed hurriedly, in one day.

Mr. BORAH. The Secretary says

We mistook the ability of the farmer to pay for his water rights. Ten years was the time given. His optimism and our own was too great. That time should be doubled. This should be done not alone because of the inability of many to meet their obligations to the Government, but because it will prove wise policy to give a free period within which the farmers may more fully use their farms. They can put their lands to a more profitable use, both to themselves and to the country, by being allowed to cumulate their earnings in the early years, and be thus enabled to make investments in stock and machinery which will make for larger profits later.

I feel the keenest sympathy with those upon these projects who are entering into this work of putting the desert into public service. They are genuine pioneers in a new field of work, on the success of which depends greatly the rescuing of a vast territory. The enemy of the Government and of the farmer is the land speculator. He is of two kinds. Sometimes he is a farmer who does not expect to farm, but to sell out at a higher price and go elsewhere. Generally, however, he is the holder of a large tract of private land within the project, who creates false values and burdens those who buy and attempt to farm with a load of debt which handicaps them in their efforts. Both of these are hostile to the welfare of the enterprise, and tend to destroy the value of the service which the Government is attempting. But such matters may, I trust, be overcome by new methods of administration.

So several months ago, after a visit to the West, the Secretary of the Interior urged it; and he has not drawn the picture to its full color. So far as he has gone he is entirely accurate, but he has been modest in his statement as to the conditions which prevail there.

I say to the Congress of the United States now, and I weigh my words, that if this session ends without the passing of that bill it will be a most wrongful and unjust thing to thousands of settlers who have been invited by the Government to go upon those lands. It will work an irreparable injury to them. They never can be compensated. They will have given up all they have, and their sacrifices upon those desert places will have been made in vain.

I appeal to the Congress and to the administration in power to consider the welfare of these people, though they be but few as compared with the 90,000,000 people of the United States, and to pass this measure before this session ends. It will be not only an act of justice, but an act of humanity, and it will be an act of injustice and inhumanity if we fail to do it.

I do not know whether we shall leave here before the 1st of September or not; but no Senator sits here who could not afford to stay 30 days to relieve those men of the situation in which they find themselves.

I ask leave to insert in connection with my remarks the bill which has passed the Senate, which has had the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, which has had the approval of the Representatives of the House who met with the Secretary of the Interior, and which, so far as I know, is without objection as to its details.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The bill referred to is as follows:

[As reported in House of Representatives, showing committee amendments.]

(Omit the part in brackets and insert the part printed in italic.)

Be it enacted; etc., That any person whose lands hereafter become subject to the terms and conditions of the act approved June 17, 1902, entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, hereafter to be referred to as the reclamation law, and any person who hereafter makes entry thereunder shall at the time of making water-right application or entry, as the case may be, pay into the reclamation fund [2] 5 per cent of the construction charge fixed for his land as an initial installment, and shall pay the balance of said charge in 15 annual installments, the first 5 of which shall each be 5 per cent of the construction charge and the remainder shall each be 7 per cent until the whole amount shall have been paid. The first of the annual installments shall become due and payable on December 1 of the fifth calendar year after the initial installment: Provided, That any water-right applicant or entryman may, if he so elects, pay the whole or any part of the construction charges owing by him within any shorter period: Provided further, That entry may be made whenever water is available, as announced by the Secretary of the Interior, and the initial payment be made when the charge per acre is established.

ACT SHALL APPLY TO EXISTING PROJECTS.

SEC. 2. That any person whose land or entry has heretofore become subject to the terms and conditions of the reclamation law shall pay the construction charge, or the portion of the construction charge remaining unpaid, in 20 annual installments, the first of which shall become due and payable on December 1 of the year in which the public notice affecting his land is issued under this act, and subsequent installments on December 1 of each year thereafter. The first 4 of such installments shall each be 2 per cent, the next 2 installments shall each be 4 per cent, and the next 14 each 6 per cent of the total construction charge or the portion of the construction charge unpaid at the beginning of such installments.

PENALTIES.

SEC. 3. That if any water-right applicant or entryman shall fail to pay any installment of his construction charges when due there shall be added to the amount unpaid a penalty of 1 per cent thereof, and there shall be added a like penalty of 1 per cent of the amount unpaid on the first day of each month thereafter so long as such default shall continue. If any such applicant or entryman shall be one year in default in the payment of any installment of the construction charges and penalties, or any part thereof, his water-right application, and if he be a homestead entryman his entry also, shall be subject to cancellation, and all payments made by him forfeited to the reclamation fund, but no homestead entry shall be subject to contest because of such default: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Interior shall so elect, he may cause suit or action to be brought for the recovery of the amount in default and penalties; but if suit or action be brought the right to declare a cancellation and forfeiture shall be suspended pending such suit or action.

INCREASE OF CHARGES.

SEC. 4. That no increase in the construction charges shall hereafter be made, after the same have been fixed by public notice, except by agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and a majority of the water-right applicants and entrymen to be affected by such increase, whereupon all water-right applicants and entrymen in the area proposed to be affected by the increased charge shall become subject thereto. Such increased charge shall be added to the construction charge and payment thereof distributed over the remaining unpaid installments of construction charges: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may agree that such increased construction charge shall be paid in additional annual installments, each of which shall be at least equal to the amount of the largest installment as fixed for the project by the public notice theretofore issued. And such additional installments of the increased construction charge, as so agreed upon, shall become due and payable on December 1 of each year subsequent to the year when the final installment of the construction charge under such public notice is due and payable: Provided further, That all such increased construction charges shall be subject to the same conditions, penalties, and suit or action as provided in section 3 of this act.

OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE.

SEC. 5. That in addition to the construction charge, every water-right applicant, entryman, or landowner under or upon a reclamation project shall also pay, whenever water service is available for the irrigation of his land, an operation and maintenance charge based upon the total cost of operation and maintenance of the project, or each separate unit thereof, and such charge shall be made for each acre-foot of water delivered; but each acre of irrigable land, whether irrigated or not, shall be charged with a minimum [maintenance] operation and [operation] maintenance charge based upon the charge for delivery of not less than 1 acre-foot of water: Provided, That, whenever any legally organized water users' association or irrigation district shall so request, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to transfer to such water users' association or irrigation district the care, operation, and maintenance of all or any part of the project works, subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. If the total amount of operation and maintenance charges and penalties collected for any one irrigation season on any project shall exceed the cost of operation and maintenance of the project during that irrigation season, the balance shall be applied to a reduction of the charge on the project for the next irrigation season, and any deficit incurred may likewise be added to the charge for the next irrigation season.

PENALTIES.

SEC. 6. That all operation and maintenance charges shall become due and payable on the date fixed for each project by the Secretary of the Interior, and if such charge is paid on or before the date when due there shall be a discount of 5 per cent of such charge; but if such charge is unpaid on the first day of the third calendar month thereafter, a penalty of 1 per cent of the amount unpaid shall be added thereto, and thereafter an additional penalty of 1 per cent of the amount unpaid shall be added on the first day of each calendar month if such charge and penalties shall remain unpaid, and no water shall be delivered to the lands of any water-right applicant or entryman who shall be in arrears for more than one calendar year for the payment of any charge for operation and maintenance, or any annual construction charge and penalties. If any water-right applicant or entryman shall be one year in [default] arrears in the payment of any charge for operation and maintenance and penalties, or any part thereof, his water-right application, and if he be a homestead entryman his entry also, shall be subject to cancellation, and all payments made by him forfeited to the reclamation fund. In the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior suit or action may be brought for the amounts in default and penalties in like manner as provided in section 3 of this act.

FISCAL AGENT.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to designate and appoint, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, the legally organized water users' association or irrigation district, under any reclamation project, as the fiscal agent of the United States to collect the annual payments on the construction charge of the project and the annual charges for operation and maintenance and all penalties: Provided, That no water-right applicant or entryman shall be entitled to credit for any payment thus made until the same shall have been paid over to an officer designated by the Secretary of the Interior to receive the same.

RECLAMATION REQUIREMENTS.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make general rules and regulations governing the use of water in the irrigation of the lands within any project, and may require the reclamation for agricultural purposes and the cultivation of [one-fourth] one-half the irrigable area under each water-right application or entry within three full irrigation seasons after the filing of water-right application or entry, and the reclamation for agricultural purposes and the cultivation of [one-half] three-fourths the irrigable area within five full irrigation seasons after the filing of the water-right application or entry, and shall provide for continued compliance with such requirements. Failure on the part of any water-right applicant or entryman to comply with such requirements shall render his application or entry subject to cancellation.

LANDS NOT SUBJECT TO RECLAMATION ACT.

SEC. 9. That in all cases where application for water right for lands in private ownership or lands held under entries not subject to the reclamation law shall not be made within one year after the passage of this act, or within one year after notice issued in pursuance of section 4 of the reclamation act, in cases where such notice has not heretofore been issued, the construction charges for such land shall be increased 5 per cent each year until such application is made and an initial installment is paid.

WITHDRAWN LANDS SUBJECT TO ENTRY.

SEC. 10. That the act of Congress approved February 18, 1911, entitled "An act to amend section 5 of the act of Congress of June 25, 1910, entitled 'An act to authorize advances to the reclamation fund and for the issuance and disposal of certificates of indebtedness in reimbursement therefor, and for other purposes,'" be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That no entry shall be hereafter made and no entryman shall be permitted to go upon lands reserved for irrigation purposes until the Secretary of the Interior shall have established the unit of acreage per entry, and water is ready to be delivered for the land in such unit or some part thereof and such fact has been announced by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That where entries made prior to June 25, 1910, have been or may be relinquished, in whole or in part, the lands so relinquished shall be subject to settlement and entry under the reclamation law."

WATER SERVICE.

SEC. 11. That whenever water is available and it is impracticable to apportion operation and maintenance charges as provided in section 5 of this act, the Secretary of the Interior may, prior to giving public notice of the construction charge per acre upon land under any project, furnish water to any entryman or private landowner thereunder until such notice is given, making a reasonable charge therefor, and such charges shall be subject to the same penalties and to the provisions for cancellation and collection as herein provided for other operation and maintenance charges.

ADMISSION OF PRIVATE LANDOWNERS TO NEW PROJECTS.

SEC. 12. That before any contract is let or work begun for the construction of any reclamation project hereafter adopted the Secretary of the Interior shall require the owners of private lands thereunder to agree to dispose of all lands in excess of the area which he shall deem sufficient for the support of a family upon the land in question, upon such terms and at not to exceed such price as the Secretary of the Interior may designate, and if any landowner shall refuse to agree to the requirements fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, his land shall not be included within the project if adopted for construction.

DISPOSITION OF EXCESS FARM UNITS.

SEC. 13. That all entries under reclamation projects containing more than one farm unit shall be reduced in area and conformed to a single farm unit within two years after making proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation, or within two years after the issuance of a farm-unit plat for the project, if the same issues subsequent to the making of such proof: Provided, That such proof is made within four years from the date as announced by the Secretary of the Interior that water is available for delivery [to] for the land. Any entryman failing within the period herein provided to dispose of the excess of his entry above one farm unit, in the manner provided by law, and to conform his entry to a single farm unit, shall render his entry subject to cancellation as to the excess above one farm unit: Provided, That upon compliance with the provisions of law such entryman shall be entitled to receive a patent for that part of his entry which conforms to one farm unit as established for the project: Provided further, That no person shall hold by assignment more than one farm unit prior to final payment of all charges for all the land held by him subject to the reclamation law, except operation and maintenance charges not then due.

ACCEPTANCE OF THIS ACT.

SEC. 14. That any person whose land or entry has heretofore become subject to the reclamation law who desires to secure the benefits of the extension of the period of payments provided by this act shall, within six months after the issuance of the first public notice hereunder affecting his land or entry, notify the Secretary of the Interior, in the manner to be prescribed by said Secretary, or his acceptance of all of the terms and conditions of this act, and thereafter his lands or entry shall be subject to all of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

[SEC. 16. That the district court of the United States for the district where the lands, or some portion of the lands, included within any reclamation project are situated shall have jurisdiction of all suits brought by the United States or the Secretary of the Interior for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, and jurisdiction of all suits now pending or which may be hereafter instituted by any legally organized water users' association or irrigation district in behalf of the water users and settlers thereon for the enforcement of the provisions of this act and of the provisions of the reclamation law as referred to and defined in section 1 of this act.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I fully agree with the suggestions made by the Senator as to the importance of passing this measure. I thought I would ask the Senator whether he does not feel that we would be justified, if necessary, in taking advantage of some of the opportunities we have to delay the passage of some measures that may be urged until that legislation is passed in another body?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have offered one amendment to the rivers and harbors bill covering a western subject. I am going to offer the bill which I have just asked to have printed in the RECORD as an amendment to the rivers and harbors bill, and I am going to offer another one covering the homestead question. I am going to test the sense of the Senate as to whether it thinks more of that kind of legislation which has come to be designated the country over as the "pork barrel" or of the interest of those who are trying to make homes in the western country. I am going to know before the session closes whether we will appropriate out of the Treasury of the United States millions of dollars, 40 or 50 per cent of which will likely be wasted before it ever gets to the place where it ought to be expended, and put aside legislation which does not cost the Government one cent in the end, but which enables the wandering settler of the West to locate himself and his family and to become an estimable citizen of this Republic.

If the Senate should come to the conclusion that it thinks more of the rivers and harbors bill than it does of that situation, I shall test the Senate upon another question, and that is whether or not it will pass the rivers and harbors bill at all.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to ask the Senator whether the amendments he proposed to the rivers and harbors bill would raise the question to which he has been speaking this afternoon. As I understand, the Senator's propositions are not "pork-barrel" propositions.

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. KENYON. How, then, can the Senator attach them to the rivers and harbors bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. I do not know, but I will undertake to demonstrate it when we get there.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to say that I am in hearty accord with the Senator from Idaho about the urgent necessity and justice of some legislation for the extension of time for settlers to make payments on their lands under the Government reclamation projects; but the Senator speaks of testing the Senate as between that proposition and the rivers and harbors bill. I merely desire to suggest to the Senator that the bill to which he refers, granting an extension of time for payments on land under the reclamation projects, has passed the Senate and is now in the House. The Senate has nothing to do with it. It has no choice between that and the rivers and harbors bill.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; the Senate will have a vast amount to do with it before the rivers and harbors bill gets through here. It will have a vast amount to do with it.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator means that if one bill is defeated the other must be defeated, I can see what the Senate has to do with it; but it has no choice now as to passing the law granting 20 years in which to make these payments.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, I understand that perfectly; but there is such a powerful momentum behind certain forms of legislation in the Congress of the United States that every man knows that if he wants to ride through the Congress he had better get on that particular wagon.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THORNTON. With the permission of the Senator from Idaho, I should like to ask him how long this discussion is to continue. When he rose to speak, the moment the speech of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] was concluded, I supposed that, of course, he was going to address the Senate on the subject of the Panama Canal tolls bill. Otherwise I certainly should have moved that the naval appropriation bill, the pending bill, should be taken up.

I am very anxious to proceed with that bill. If we do not get through with it to-night we will not get through with it for a week. I never would have consented to the Senator taking up this time if I had not supposed he was going to speak on the subject of the Panama Canal tolls.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, with all due respect to my friend from Louisiana—for whom, as he knows, I have a very kindly regard—the Senator from Louisiana has nothing to do with consenting to my occupying the floor.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, to that I will say that while the Senator is on the floor I can not interfere with him, but I could have objected to his speaking on any other subject except the Panama Canal tolls bill; and I should have called up that measure, which is a preference bill, if I had known the Senator was going to speak on any other subject. I am not trying to take him off his feet now, but I asked that he would give me an idea as to how much longer this discussion would continue. Before he began I spoke to him, having understood from the chairman of the Interoceanic Canals Committee that he wanted to speak on the subject of tolls. He told me he desired to speak about 20 minutes. He rose the very moment the Senator from California had concluded, and, of course, I supposed he was going to talk on the subject of tolls. It is well known that the naval bill comes up every day immediately after the discussion of the tolls bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would not inconvenience the Senator from Louisiana in passing an appropriation bill. I know how important it is to get through appropriation bills; but I wish to say to the Senator from Louisiana in all candor that if he knew the situation in the West, and the necessity of this legislation, he would not become irritated with the Senator from Idaho because he undertakes to present in a very few minutes what the Senator from Idaho deems the very unfortunate situation of the portion of the country which he has the honor in part to represent.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, the situation is simply this: The naval appropriation bill is a preference bill, and had the right of way the moment the tolls bill was laid aside. I had the right to call it up, or ask that it be called up, and I think the Senate would have granted the request that it should be called up, as it has done every day heretofore.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator could not have kept me off the floor, although had he requested me to remain off the floor I would have done so until another hour; but had the Senator called up this bill, I should have simply addressed myself to this subject under the subject of appropriations. I wanted to discuss this matter; everything seemed quiet and calm and practically nobody was here. There were only three Senators in the Senate Chamber when I began to speak. I did not see any wild rush to discharge public business or any great agitation of mind over getting these bills through, and I thought it was a good opportunity to add a little respectability to the rivers and harbors bill by informing the Senate that I was going to offer some amendments to it.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I can only repeat what I said before. The Senator would never have spoken with my consent, and I do not believe the Senate would have agreed to allowing him to do so, if I had known that he was not going to speak on the subject of Panama Canal tolls, because he knows as well as everybody else here knows that the naval bill had the right of way the moment the Panama Canal tolls bill was out of the way.

Mr. GALLINGER. It had no right of way.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I want to appeal to my friend from Idaho please to let us go on with the naval bill. He is so eloquent that we all like to hear him; I particularly like to hear him; but I appeal to him now to let us go on with the naval bill.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from South Carolina is making this a personal matter, I shall certainly yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do make it a personal matter. I ask the Senator to yield, as a friend of mine.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senator from South Carolina is not in good health.

Mr. TILLMAN. I sympathize with the Senator in his desire to help his constituents out there, and perhaps I will vote with him.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to have the Senator make it a little stronger than "perhaps." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I am going to yield on this proposition to-day, with the suggestion that when I can get on the floor without inconveniencing my colleagues I am going to continue the discussion. I want to discuss particularly an amendment to the homestead bill and for increased loan for the reclamation fund. These are the three measures which we can pass and which we should pass. I shall present the matter later. I now yield at the request of my friend from South Carolina.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the Panama Canal tolls bill may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. THORNTON. The Senator might have said that it was laid aside practically half an hour ago, when the Senator from Idaho began to talk on conservation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be temporarily laid aside.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask that the Senate resume the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14034) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment of the committee, on page 59, after line 13, where it is proposed to insert:

A committee is hereby authorized to be appointed to consist of one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate and one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, to be selected by the chairmen of the respective committees, and one naval officer, to be selected by the Secretary of the Navy, to investigate and report at the next regular session of Congress upon the selection of a suitable site for the erection of an armor plant to enable the United States to manufacture its own armor plate and special-treatment steel capable of standing all ballistic and other necessary tests required for use in vessels of the Navy at the lowest possible cost to the Government, taking into consideration all of the elements necessary for the economical and successful operation of such a plant, such as the availability of labor, material, and fuel, and transportation facilities to and from said plant. Said report shall contain the cost of a site sufficient to accommodate a plant having an annual output capacity of 20,000 tons and a site for an output of 10,000 tons, and also an itemized statement of the cost of the necessary buildings, machinery, and accessories for each, and the annual cost and maintenance of each, and the estimated cost of the finished product.

Said committee is authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths.

The sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of said committee and to be immediately available.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I make the point of order against this amendment that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not believe it is general legislation. It has been some time since the Chair tried to practice law, but it is his recollection that general legislation is any legislation which applies generally to the people of the United States or which applies generally to any class of citizens of the United States who may come within the purview of the legislation, or any legislation which attempts to limit, alter, or change that which has been heretofore fixed by the statutes of the United States as applying generally to departments or officers.

The Chair does not believe this amendment comes within any of those rules; but it is special in character, and applies to one particular subject.

The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I am not sufficiently familiar with what is known as parliamentary law or parliamentary usages to argue this proposition. Not being able to argue it, I shall not appeal from the decision of the Chair, although from what little light I have upon the subject I can not concur in the views expressed by the Vice President.

On the merits of this proposition, however, I am opposed to it, because I am opposed to extending the operations of the General Government into the domain which ought to be left to private enterprise.

As a part of my remarks I wish to send to the desk and ask to have read a letter which I received some time ago upon this very subject from one of the most eminent lawyers in the State of Pennsylvania. He is a lifelong Democrat. I might style him the nestor of the Philadelphia bar. He expresses his views upon the subject in such strong language and in such apt terms that I think what he says will express my views much better than anything I could say.

I ask that the Secretary may read the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

(Personal.)

LAW OFFICES,
DICKSON, BEITLER & MCCOUCH,
750 Bullitt Building, Philadelphia, May 27, 1913.

Hon. GEORGE T. OLIVER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. OLIVER: You ought to be better qualified than anyone else in Washington to expose the absurdity of the proposal of the Secretary of the Navy to build an armor plant, and you would be doing a great public service if you would make a brief statement of the facts.

It is hard to understand what notion he would have of building an armor plant without undertaking to produce the steel to be used in making the plates, and the cost of a complete plant would probably prove to be nearer $10,000,000 than $5,000,000.

Assuming that the Navy Department was in possession of such a plant, no matter how well designed and equipped, how could it possibly run it with a shifting force of employees? To insure armor of the quality required by the department it would probably cost in the Government plant two or three times as much as if made by the three concerns which are now making it. You could easily get information as to the misfits which must be counted on and the incidental losses, which can, however, be put to use in the other departments of such plants. * * * [Clause read subsequently omitted from the RECORD.]

I have no other interest in the matter than as a citizen and as a Democrat who is disgusted with the incompetency and disregard of Democratic doctrine by the people who are now usurping the name of the party which in former years deserved the respect of those who believed in its principles. The men who are now masquerading as Democrats have no more notion of the true function of the State than the Czar of Russia, and the only definite purpose which they seem to have in view is to multiply its officeholders and to intermeddle with the business of the citizen.

Truly, yours,
SAMUEL DICKSON.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, Is the writer of this letter a manufacturer of armor plate or connected with the manufacture of armor?

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all. He is a lawyer, and all his life has spent his time in his law office.

Mr. KENYON. Is he employed by a manufacturer of armor plate?

Mr. OLIVER. Not to my knowledge. He wrote to me simply as a citizen of Pennsylvania writing to his representative in the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania if he thinks it is proper to insert in the RECORD a letter which makes such a reference as this letter does to the Secretary of the Navy and also to his supporters in the Senate. It seems to me that on sober second thought the Senator will withdraw at least that part of the letter from the RECORD which refers to the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to know to what part the Senator refers.

Mr. THOMAS. That part which refers to the Secretary of the Navy and his supporters in the Senate. It may be in accordance with the notions of a distinguished Philadelphia Democrat, but he should not make such reflections upon a portion of this body and upon the Secretary of the Navy. I certainly do not believe the Senator from Pennsylvania would approve of it.

Mr. OLIVER. I have nothing further to say, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not rise to appeal from the decision in relation to the point of order raised against the amendment, but I wish to say that in my opinion it is legislation upon an appropriation bill, and I can not help but believe that the point of order should be sustained. I am not going to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I am not particularly interested in the item, and therefore I do not raise the question at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule says "general legislation," not "legislation."

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of that, but the practice of the Senate has been in the past that items of this kind, which are purely legislation and can not be classed as special legislation, have always fallen under the head of general legislation. That is as I understand it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move to strike from the RECORD the letter which was read at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I think with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that it is an unjust reflection not only upon officers of the Cabinet but upon Members of the Senate as well. Further than that, I think the Senator from Pennsylvania adopted the language as his own when he said that it expressed his views better and more clearly than it would be possible for him to do himself. I do not think the letter ought to be placed in the RECORD at all.

Mr. THOMAS. The part of the letter to which I object, and which I think should go out—not the entire letter upon the motion of the Senator from Oregon—is the part which I have included in parentheses on page 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to strike the letter from the RECORD.

Mr. LEWIS. May I not offer as a substitute motion that the Senator from Pennsylvania tendering the letter be permitted to withdraw from the letter the portion which has been designated as obnoxious, and on his own motion, he having had it called to his attention?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon to strike out the letter from the RECORD.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I would be quite as much a stickler for the dignity and respect of the Senate of the United States as anyone in this Chamber, but, after all, I think this is a good deal of a tempest in a teapot and it is perfectly harmless. The protest by this distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania is entirely in harmony with that element that think everything the Democratic Party does is wrong. It is in harmony with the protest which was made when we started the parcel-post legislation. There came up what seemed to be a universal protest stating how the Government was running wild, that we were running into business, and all that sort of thing. When we started the proposition of appropriating $500,000 for a powder plant in order to make a little powder the same sort of protest was made. It has been made in years past and it will continue to be made as long as time lasts. It is utterly harmless.

I do not believe that Secretary Daniels will feel one whit smaller after having seen this letter spread upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD than before he read it. I believe it is just spending our time for naught. I would be perfectly willing to let the protest go on. It does not hurt us, and I do not believe it dignifies and advances the distinguished man who wrote the letter or the distinguished Senator who presents it.

Mr. LEWIS. But, Mr. President, upon the motion made to strike out this document from the RECORD I have this observation to make: I regard the general tendency a very dangerous one that has lately arisen and apparently seems now to grow in this body, that because a document may contain some observation not agreeable to the tastes or the sense of refinement of any Member the document must be stricken from consideration.

In this particular case there are statements which good taste would not have permitted and which offend against that form which has prevailed in discussion in this body; but what interests me is this: The Senator from Pennsylvania, unless I misunderstood him, and I now invite his attention to what I am saying, said that he offered this letter as a part of his remarks and adopted it as his views. If he did such, then it was the speech of the Senator and his remarks entering into his speech, and for myself I can not vote to establish the precedent that a Senator can have his remarks either stricken from the RECORD or be prevented from making them because they partake of censure or criticism or condemnation of a public official when in the exercise of conduct known as public conduct.

It was because of that that I asked the Senator from Pennsylvania if he would give attention to the part of the letter which is regarded as obnoxious to the rule of the Senate and thus eliminate it upon his own volition. That he, for reasons satisfactory to himself, declines to do.

Mr. OLIVER rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania wish to interrupt me?

Mr. OLIVER. I was waiting until the Senator from Illinois would conclude.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator now.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I intended to say just what I really propose to do.

Mr. LEWIS. I would rather yield now to the Senator.

Mr. OLIVER. I think when my remarks are read it will be seen that what I said alluded to the arguments presented in the letter of Mr. Dickson as stating the case better than I could state it; that is, on the armor-plant proposition. I wish to say that I did not intend to adopt his language as a whole, but I discover that there is in the letter a reflection upon the Secretary of the Navy which certainly does not reflect my views, and which if I had examined more carefully I certainly would not have included, because for the Secretary of the Navy personally I have a very high regard, and I am unwilling that anything should go into the RECORD, at least at my instance, that would make a statement such as is made in this letter. I do not want the language to go into the RECORD, and I would ask, therefore, Mr. President, that the last sentence of the next to the last paragraph be omitted from the letter of Mr. Dickson.

Mr. THOMAS. I will ask the Senator if that covers all the expression which I included in parentheses.

Mr. OLIVER. I have not looked at it, but I presume it does. I will have the Secretary look at it and see.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator will discover that the portion which is included in parenthetical lines is all that need be omitted. The previous part of the sentence is entirely unobjectionable.

Mr. OLIVER. I will omit it.

Mr. THOMAS. I personally want to thank the Senator for his courtesy in the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon still insist on his motion?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I withdraw it, in view of the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Oregon is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Louisiana in charge of the bill, I ask the Senate to recur to pages 18 and following. I wish to offer an amendment there. I will explain the amendment later on. The Secretary can read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

The SECRETARY. Page 18, line 2, after the word "all," strike out "$5,800,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,400,000."

Page 21, line 22, after the word "leave," strike out "$1,600,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,600,000."

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, I will explain just what I am seeking to accomplish.

Much has been said in both House and Senate as to what it costs to build a battleship. Figures have been quoted to show that navy-yard work is more expensive than outside work; and two separate amendments submitted by the Secretary of the Navy have been ruled out on points of order, although they sought to give the responsible head of a great executive department an opportunity to properly carry on the duties of his office and intelligently economize in the expenditure of Government funds.

These amendments were unfortunately worded, perhaps, and not as clear as they should have been; but I am certain there was no purpose to deceive Congress or to use money unwisely or wastefully.

Last evening I held a conference with the Secretary of the Navy, and talked this whole matter over with him. I pointed out the necessity for changing the sums to be appropriated in the bill. He suggested the amendment which I will send to the Clerk's desk, stating at the same time that the bureau chiefs, for want of time, could only make guesses of the approximate amounts permissible or that could be spared from the other appropriations to make up the $2,000,000 necessary for "maintenance, yards and docks." He has promised that the next naval estimates sent to Congress shall comply strictly with section 3666 of the Revised Statutes—the law in regard to estimates. So far as I can promise, as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, I will see to it that the law is carried out to the letter. The House, of course, is primarily responsible for all appropriation bills, and they have sent us the best one they could under the circumstances. That it is not at all accurate or satisfactory is the fault of the system of bookkeeping in the Navy Department. Under the system which the Secretary will inaugurate on his own motion, I am sure there will be no cause for complaint hereafter.

The present system of cost accounting for work done at navy yards was inaugurated July 1, 1910, by order of Secretary of the Navy Meyer, this system having been devised by Marwick, Mitchell & Co., certified public accountants. The system had for its stated object the standardization of Navy accounts in such manner as to more accurately distribute charges among the various naval appropriations, and purported to absorb into the cost of work all expenditures of every kind in any way connected with or incident to the doing of the work. This system failed to take into account the fact that navy yards must and will be maintained in a condition of military preparedness, without regard to the volume of output work; and in attempting to graft a commercial system onto an establishment largely military the authors ignored section 3678, Revised Statutes, or did not know of its existence. And the Secretary of the Navy did the same thing or he would not have issued the orders to institute this system of bookkeeping at all. While his intentions were no doubt good, the results have been the deplorable confusion which now exists. Secretary Daniels, when he took charge of the Navy Department, found this system of bookkeeping already in force there, and as he could not get any accurate information concerning costs he set about investigating the bookkeeping. He was unwilling to overturn his predecessor's work without good reason. He has had two accomplished naval officers, Pay Inspector McGowan and Col. Radford, of the Marine Corps, at work for months trying to find out just what was the matter. This system of bookkeeping was authorized under the act of June 24, 1910, and Congress appropriated $30,000 to pay the experts who devised it. Instead of clarifying and simplifying matters, as was claimed, it has wrought confusion worse confounded, and Secretary Meyer can not be congratulated upon the success of his experiment.

It all comes to this: The amount of money carried by the appropriation, "Maintenance, yards and docks," is $2,000,000 less than is required for the various purposes named in the said appropriation, and the present accounting rules offer an ingeniously devised system of augmenting one appropriation for another—the result being excessive costs on some items, but no apparent deficiency. The amendment now offered is to increase the appropriation, "Maintenance, yards and docks," by $2,000,000 deducted here and there from various other appropriations made too large by erroneous estimates which have grown up under the iniquitous system against which the Secretary of the Navy most earnestly set himself from the moment he found it out.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I confess to not understanding the composite amendment of the Senator from South Carolina as offered, but I will venture to ask the Senator if the figures that he has given in his amendment correspond with the estimates of the department.

Mr. TILLMAN. They do.

Mr. GALLINGER. On all points?

Mr. TILLMAN. The amounts are the same. We do not add an additional dollar, but change the items and deduct from some and make up $2,000,000 for yards and docks.

Mr. GALLINGER. They do not correspond with the estimates for the various items sent to Congress, I assume.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not think they do, because the estimates were based on the erroneous system of bookkeeping that the Secretary of the Navy is trying to get rid of.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think we have even the right to increase and decrease amounts so that they do not agree with the estimates that were sent to Congress from the department?

Mr. TILLMAN. I think the Senate ought to be able to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator think it would be very dangerous legislation for us to go into that kind of a thing, because if we can do it on this appropriation bill we can do it on all appropriation bills, and we can carry out our own notions in reference to the different appropriations without any regard to the opinions of the head of the department.

Mr. TILLMAN. The head of the department himself has asked that this change be made, and he has given an explanation of the reason why he asks it. He has a system of bookkeeping there which, as I said, is confusion worse confounded, and the more he tried to unravel it and to find out what he ought to estimate the more befuddled he became.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then he did not know at the time he made his estimate what he has since learned?

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course he did not know or he would not have sent it down here.

Mr. GALLINGER. I confess, Mr. President, this is extraordinary legislation; but if the majority side of the Chamber feel that it is safe legislation I have nothing more to say.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am sure it is safe on this one bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have never known legislation of this kind to be indulged in in the Senate before.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I not only consider it unsafe, but most extraordinary. It is re-forming the naval appropriation bill in the teeth of estimates sent to Congress officially by the Secretary of the Treasury, who has been advised by the Secretary of the Navy. This is in violation of the rules of the Senate. This increase of $2,000,000 has not been estimated for.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is no increase whatever; it is just a change.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Then I am unable to understand the English language. There is a distinct statement that it is an increase of $2,000,000 for yards and docks. It is true it is not an increase in the aggregate, but these appropriations must be treated separately, and they will have to be voted upon separately, if the amendment ever comes to a vote. It is impossible to offer 15 or 20 amendments, scattered through the bill, and expect that they shall be voted upon as one proposition.

But I do not think it will ever come to a vote. It is a most extraordinary proposition that the Secretary of the Navy, discharging the obligations of his office, should make estimates and furnish them to Congress and afterwards, when the bill is in the final stage of its passage, the same Secretary should come here and in defiance of his previous estimate ask that the bill be changed to the extent of $2,000,000. While there may be no increase in the aggregate there is an increase to the amount of $2,000,000 in some places and there is a diminution in other places.

I make the point of order that there is an increase and that it is not estimated for. It is plainly out of order. There is no estimate for any increase of the estimates as given in the bill and reported to the Senate by a committee of the Senate. The Senate has a right to expect from the Secretary of the Navy a careful estimate of each item of expenditure required by his department. He has made that estimate with the aid of his bureau chiefs and has sent it to Congress. The committee of the Senate has acted on it and has reported to the Senate in accordance with those estimates.

Now, here comes an informal statement, privately made by the Secretary of the Navy. He gives a private memorandum to a member of the committee. The committee itself has had no opportunity to consider this radical change, amounting in the aggregate to $2,000,000. Wherever there is an increase to any clause or clauses by this amendment it is an increase without an estimate, and is plainly out of order.

Mr. TILLMAN. There has been enough decrease to make up the $2,000,000 item. It is merely transferring from some items and putting them in this yard-and-dock item.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. On that principle the entire bill might be changed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. THORNTON. I now ask that the amendment on page 31, after line 6, heretofore submitted, which was temporarily passed over at the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming, be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, after line 6, insert:

That the act approved August 22, 1912, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, in so far as it relates to the payment of six months' pay to the widow of an officer or enlisted man, etc., be amended to read as follows:

"That hereafter immediately upon official notification of the death, from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct, of any officer or enlisted man on the active list of the Navy and Marine Corps the Paymaster General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to the widow and, if no widow, to the children, and, if there be no children, to any other dependent relative of such officer or enlisted man previously designated by him, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the date of his death, exclusive of any expenses of interment which the Government defrays under existing law."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the matter is legislation of a general character. It seeks to amend a statute that is already in the general statutes of the country, and I make the point of order against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. THORNTON. The committee has not finished offering amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

Mr. THORNTON. I send up the following committee amendment and ask to have it read to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, after line 17, add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That all appropriations contained in this act shall be immediately available from the date of the passage thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was not privileged to be in the Chamber much of the time during the consideration of this bill, having been occupied as a member of a conference committee.

In looking over the RECORD I notice that a new dry dock, at a cost of $3,000,000, has been provided for the Norfolk yard. I believe it was estimated for, and it was properly before the Senate. If I read the RECORD correctly, I believe the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] admitted that there are now three dry docks at Norfolk—I ask the junior Senator from Virginia if that is correct—and that this will be the fourth dry dock at that station.

Mr. SWANSON. There is an old one. I think there is only one in very much use for large ships. One of them is very old.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not finding fault with that legislation, because I apprehend that the dock is needed at that important yard to care for the large ships of the Navy. But I want to call attention to the fact that there are other yards, and I speak particularly of one yard that ought to be provided with an additional dock, and that is at Portsmouth, N. H. The climatic conditions, Mr. President, where that dock is located are of the best, and it is the only harbor north of Hatteras that does not freeze in the wintertime. It is always open; it is open the year around, and it will probably continue open for all time to come.

There is very deep water in the harbor of Portsmouth. I think deeper than in any other harbor in the country; at any rate, it is more than sufficient to accommodate the largest ships that have ever been built or that ever will be built. We have in that community an abundance of skilled labor of the highest quality, and the work done there is beyond criticism. We have one dock in Portsmouth, I believe 750 feet in length, constructed a few years ago to take the place of an old wooden dock that was out of commission, and the new dock is of a most excellent quality, being constructed of granite, and is answering its purposes, so far as its capacity allows; but we really need another dock in that navy yard, and it ought to be of modern construction and practically of the same size as the one already ordered for Norfolk. For that reason I am going to offer an amendment providing for a new dock for the Portsmouth yard. In entire frankness, I will say that it has not been estimated for, and that the amendment on that point is subject to a point of order. I hope, however, that no point of order will be made against it, but that it will be allowed to go to conference, where the friends of the appropriation will be permitted to present reasons that can not now be presented for its retention in the bill. Had I been in the Senate Chamber when the Norfolk dock was discussed I would have presented reasons why a new dock should be constructed at the Portsmouth yard, but the Senator in charge of the bill is anxious to get a vote, and I will not detain the Senate long.

I will simply repeat, Mr. President, the suggestion that I hope the point of order will not be made against the amendment, but that the matter will be allowed to go to conference. Whatever happens to it there will not be questioned by me. I hope that the point of order will not be made against it. If, on the other hand, the amendment should finally go out in conference, I shall be satisfied with the action of the committee of conference. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 15, on page 26, it is proposed to insert the following:

NAVY YARD, PORTSMOUTH, N. H.

New dry dock at the Portsmouth Navy Yard, N. H., of sufficient size to accommodate the largest battleship, and to be at least 1,000 feet in length, designs and specifications to be determined by the Secretary of the Navy (to cost $2,500,000), $200,000.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I make the point of order against that amendment. I regret to do so on account of my personal feelings for the Senator from New Hampshire, inasmuch as he earnestly requested that it be not done, but I feel that it is my duty to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Louisiana. He is always kind, and I regret that he can not see his way clear to let this amendment go on the bill and go to conference; but, as I said before, the amendment is undoubtedly subject to a point of order, and the Senator from Louisiana is acting entirely within his rights in making that point against it. When the next naval appropriation bill comes before the Senate I will have something more to say on the subject, believing that the Portsmouth yard is entitled to an additional dock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment, in line 16, on page 56, after the word "constructed," to strike out "two" and insert "one," so as to provide for the construction of but one battleship.

Mr. President, I am not going to take the time of the Senate to discuss this question at any great length, but I want to say that I think the American people are going wild on the subject of making ready for war. We are talking about war and about getting ready for war. Whenever one of these bills is up for consideration it is not infrequent that mysterious information is sent to the committee, and the newspapers talk about the probability of an assault being made on us from the west. I think if we would talk more about peace, think more about peace, and do more for the promotion of peace, it would not be necessary to make such expensive provision for war.

The United States Government is in a position where it can set an example, where it can lead the world in the matter of forming sentiment; and, after all, Mr. President, Governments, like individuals, are controlled and influenced by sentiment. Laws are but the crystallization of public sentiment. I think that in these expensive preparations for war the influence of the men who are interested in the manufacture of armament in writing these bills is greater than any other influence that enters into the consideration. And I think those men who, for their own interest, insist upon a great Navy and large Army and in that way increase the burdens of taxation upon the people are a greater menace to our country and enemies more to be dreaded than the enemy who lives across the seas. This phase of the question calls for the most careful scrutiny by the Congress.

I, for one, am tired and sick of this policy of depauperating and burdening the toiling millions of this Republic with the enormous expense of maintaining armies and navies. I am advised that probably 70 per cent of the appropriations made by Congress go to pay the expenses of the wars of the past and to get ready for another war. I repeat, if we would talk more about peace, if we would make preparations for peace, there would be less necessity for this tremendous outlay of money and therefore less likelihood of war. I think nations, like individuals, when they are ready to fight, when they are conscious of their strength and preparedness, are very much more inclined to "pick a fuss," if I may use that old expression, or a difficulty with another nation than they would be if they were not so well prepared. I have never known a man who carried a gun or went armed all the time looking for somebody to insult him that did not find some excuse for a row.

Mr. President, if we could write more of the spirit of the Golden Rule into our laws and less of the damnable spirit of the rule of gold, if we could discard the old barbarous theory in government of "the survival of the fittest," and so conduct ourselves in our relations to other Governments as that all Governments might be helped to become fit to survive, this terrific burden would be taken from the shoulders of the toilers of this country.

War is barbarous and out of harmony with the spirit of the times, and the burden which Congress puts upon the shoulders of the producers of this country in making preparations for war is, to my mind, highly immoral; it is an unwarranted misuse of the fruits of human effort.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he does not think this Government ought to prepare for war when it invades a weak and crippled foreign nation and commences the taking of human life for no better reason than that a usurper in that country has failed to salute the flag of this Nation?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, I do not think, Mr. President, that one possible mistake would justify the committing of another. As to the motives which induced the present administration to go to Mexico, of the facts behind that movement I am not advised. I will say, since the Senator propounded the question, that I personally have about come to the conclusion that it would be infinitely better for the American people if we would attend to our business and let the other nations of the earth attend to theirs; it would be much better for us. I am tired of the United States Government playing the rôle of policeman for the Western Hemisphere. It is rather a costly policy, and I fail to see what we will get out of it except the hatred and deep-seated animosity of the people whom we regulate.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, or the Senator who represents the committee, if this bill carries any deficit; and, if so, to what amount? Are all of these live appropriations to be expended during the next fiscal year, or are some of them for deficits as they come in here?

Mr. THORNTON. The bill carries no deficit.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the only criticism which I feel justified in making of the amendment just offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is that it does not go far enough. The purpose of that amendment is to reduce the number of battleships to be provided by this bill from two to one. I shall at the proper time, but without any expectation that it will be carried, offer another amendment, which will go much further than that portion of the bill relating to two battleships. I do not presume that what I shall say—and I shall be as brief as possible—will have any particular effect upon the fate of this measure; but I do indulge the hope that it may attract some attention outside of this Chamber and thus aid in strengthening a public opinion already asserting itself against this policy.

I voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] providing for the construction of one of these vessels in a navy yard belonging to the Government, and I should, with equal pleasure, have voted for an amendment providing that all of this construction should be so carried on, because just in proportion as the Government assumes responsibility of building its own vessels, just in that proportion will the real inducement that operates to cause these enormous appropriations disappear. When the Government builds its own vessels and manufactures its own armor plate and its own powder and its own munitions of war, the period of retrenchment in naval construction will have arrived. So long as these vessels are constructed by private enterprise, so long as armor plate and all the munitions of war are manufactured by private enterprise, just so long will the Congress of the United States continue to emulate the bad example of other nations and make appropriation after appropriation for the building of these huge monsters of destruction that become practically obsolete before they are complete.

Mr. President, I sometimes wonder how long this "endless chain" of battleship building is going to continue. We all know how it began and why it persists. Great Britain builds four battleships every year, we will say, because Germany builds two; and Germany builds two because England builds four and France builds two; and France builds two because Germany constructs two and England four; and Japan builds two because France builds two and Germany builds two and Great Britain builds four; and the United States builds two because Japan builds two and France builds two and Great Britain builds four and Germany constructs two. There used to be a saying in Georgia when I was a boy that "we raise cotton to get money to buy niggers to raise cotton to get money to buy niggers to raise cotton to get money to buy niggers." So, the great powers of the world are building battleships because each of them is engaged in the game, and because the motive power to all of it is furnished by the greatest, the most conscienceless and infamous trust that ever disgraced civilization, a combination, Mr. President, whose chief asset is the creation of discord among nations, which manufactures war and rumors of war, which plays upon the apprehensions of mankind, which warns each nation against the devilish machinations of all its neighbors, and assures them that absolute preparedness is essential to national safety and the preservation of public peace.

This trust finds expression in many ways, Mr. President, and avails itself of all of them. The press, the Army, the Navy, the pulpit, the Navy League, and various other agencies are constantly engaged in warning all people of the necessity of preparedness for war and calling attention to the superiority of foreign armaments as compared with domestic ones; to the plans of foreign governments as to increased armament; to menaces against the Monroe doctrine; and to that terrible shop-worn specter of an invading army from Japan appearing suddenly upon our Pacific coast and spreading destruction and desolation among our defenseless people.

Mr. President, it seems to me—and I believe that every nation should have a fair navy, an adequate navy—that we have already more ships than we know what to do with. Our battleships number 39; and this bill provides for the sale of two of them. Why? Because we do not need them or because they are obsolete, or both? If they are good vessels and we need them, why should we sell them to any foreign nation, which may afterwards, if the war trust shall be credited, turn their guns against us? If they are obsolete, if they are deficient, so that they can not stand against the great battleships of the present day, is it not fair to assume that in 10 years from now the battleships of to-day will be equally unreliable, and must consequently be sold or go to the scrap heap?

Mr. President, this sort of competition in the manufacture of great modern weapons for the destruction of human life has been going on some 35 or 40 years, and the progressive increase of armament carries progressive increase of cost, which has been advancing by leaps and bounds, so that the national debts of the world to-day, according to the last estimates, aggregate $42,000,000,000, which, added to State, railway, municipal, and public utilities debts, it is fair to say, makes the public and semipublic indebtedness of the civilized nations $100,000,000,000, drawing annual interest at not less than an average of 4 per cent, or $4,000,000,000, an amount representing perhaps 50 per cent of the productive energy of the civilized world; in other words, Mr. President, the people of the world who produce, who bear the burdens of life, before any of their earnings can be utilized for ordinary affairs, must pay $4,000,000,000 as interest to those who hold their securities, and of this stupendous national debt fully two-thirds has been contracted in offensive and defensive wars, in the expenses consequent upon the waging of war, and in preparation for wars that are to come.

On December 4 last the New York World, under the title "A sign of sanity," published this editorial:

The fall of the Barthou ministry in France was occasioned by a proposal to make the new bond issue tax free. The real cause was growing irritation with the militarist program; with a $260,000,000 addition to a national debt now more than $800 for each family; with the withdrawal of the youth of the land from industry for a three-year service; with war costs, besides the loss of these young men's time, which tax the average family more than $70 a year in a land of low wages and general economy. It is significant that M. Caillaux, who opposes the three-year enlistment, is the man of the hour.

This situation in France is a sign of sanity. Is it not time for a similar revolt here? Is not the world ready for it?

The French Government spends 60 per cent of its ordinary revenues on war purposes. Our proportion has not greatly changed since Representative Tawney figured that 71 per cent of the yearly appropriations went that wasteful way.

The increase is most startling in naval expenditures:

1900	48,099,969
1909	122,662,485
1911	131,410,568

I may digress here for a moment, Mr. President, to refer to the fact that, so far as naval construction in this country has gone, we have paid our way, but the fact nevertheless remains that the money which we have used to pay our way has been raised by taxation and is as much a part of the public burden as though we had borrowed money and were paying interest upon it.

In 20 years the population of the country has grown 47 per cent; naval expenditure more than 500 per cent. Twenty years ago the Army, properly regarded as Indian police and as a skeleton organization in war, cost more than the Navy, though both combined ran to but $26,329,701 in 1884. The Navy, the big-stick branch of the service, has now surpassed even the enlarged Army in cost. If Representative HOBSON'S idea had been followed of an Atlantic and a Pacific fleet, each equal to any other in the world, we should have to-day for the Navy alone a budget of $600,000,000, 272,000 men withdrawn from production for sea service, and very likely a doubled national debt. And what should we have gained by it, except harder times, more destitution, and the hatred of our menaced neighbors?

The fall of the Barthou ministry, the bitter memory in Germany of the failure to float new war bonds last spring at low prices, and the ascendancy of the pacific Liberal party in Great Britain are conditions favorable to the "naval holiday" proposed by Winston Churchill and again by Secretary Daniels in his report. Why can not the great nations agree to stop this bankrupting race for one year? If for one year, why not for five years? Why not altogether? And why should not the great Republic lead the way?

About the same time, Mr. President, the Saturday Evening Post contained an editorial, the title of which is "The Largest Scrapheap," which I will also read:

Various foreign governments, according to reports that have been received in Wall Street of late, are arranging or contemplating bond issues that aggregate one billion and a half dollars. The list begins with Russia, which wants half a billion, and ends with Argentina, which can get along with sixteen millions. Pretty nearly two-thirds of the total is for military purposes.

A bulletin recently published by the Department of Commerce recites that the aggregate indebtedness of all nations for which data can be had was two and a half billion dollars in 1800, eight and a half billions in 1850, thirty-one and a quarter billions in 1900, and forty-two billions in 1912. The present total, therefore, is equal to about one-third of the total wealth of the United States, which is the richest country in the world.

By far the greater part of this tidy sum represents sheer economic waste.

And that, Mr. President, is the great indictment of such expenditures—the dreadnaughts of a dozen years ago that are now mere junk, or those of last year that will be mere junk by 1920; powder and shell shot away; the cost of transporting a great army from England to South Africa, where it tilted at a Dutch windmill and then came home, leaving the windmill practically intact, and so on.

A few persons have profited, namely, statesmen, Army and Navy officers, and manufacturers of arms and munitions. For their sakes and in support of a tradition that has no rational relationship to modern conditions the game goes on at a constantly accelerating pace. It is interesting to consider how high the scrapheap will grow in the next 20 years.

A few persons have profited, Mr. President, largely; a great many persons have profited by the construction of battleships and other naval armament very considerably. The sensation which greeted the world last year when Liebknecht called attention to the fact that the War Trust had reached out and embraced within its tentacles officers of the German Army, men high in the councils of that great Empire, had scarcely died away before a similar sensation occurred on the other side of the world. Japan found herself face to face with the humiliating and disgraceful fact that the War Trust had its representatives touching the throne; that officers high in the navy and others in authority were receiving contributions and compensations from this aggregation, which by playing on the fears of mankind supplies the nations of the earth with engines for their own destruction; that its corrupting influences were securing imperial patronage through the corruption of public servants.

Members of the ministry were compelled to resign, and the world knows to-day that the corruption and grafting of the war trust has permeated the inner circles of the great Kingdom of Japan.

Fortunately, as far as we are concerned, we have thus far escaped the contagion of scandal; but if this mad race for naval supremacy continues, how long will it be before the United States will be compelled to hang its head in shame over disclosures that may involve some of our public men with its methods and its policies?

More important than all, however, is the question whether this competition is to continue until the nations are face to face, as they must be, with inevitable bankruptcy. How long must the people of the world continue to pay interest on billions upon billions of public debt, the principal of which never will be and never can be paid, and which is continuing to swell yearly in its huge and ponderous aggregate? How long can the industry of the world stand the burden of the ever-increasing annual interest charge?

No man is visionary enough to imagine for a moment that the national debts of the world ever will be paid. They constitute a constant burden, permanently resting upon the shoulders of mankind, increasing in its weight and in the awful tax that it wrings from production. It must end either in policies which will end the constant increase of the amount or in repudiation. Indeed, we hear now from some sources the threat of repudiation. It comes from those who pay the toll, from those whose earnings are diverted from their normal purposes and their own comfort to the chests of the money changer, and who reaps all the benefit which comes from national indebtedness, and which makes it the greater national calamity.

Mr. President, some time ago, I think during the past year, Mr. Churchill, of the British ministry, proposed a naval holiday, to the end that all the nations might find temporary surcease from this huge outlay of needless expenditure. In some countries his proposition was greeted with derision; in others it inspired epithets and abuse; but in America it found an appropriate and generous response in the action of the House of Representatives and in the suggestions of the Secretary of the Navy. The nations have virtually rejected that suggestion; at any rate, they have paid no attention to it, and the budgets for naval construction in nearly all of the countries of the world are far greater than they ever have been before.

Mr. President, why can not this great country, dedicated in principle and theory to peace among the nations, isolated from all contact with any power sufficiently great to menace its institutions—why can not this mighty Republic, in the good year 1914, set an example to all the kingdoms and principalities of the world by declining to go into naval construction at all this year, followed or accompanied by an announcement that its policy will be continued if the other nations will cooperate, to the end that the burdens which the people carry in this mad effort to see which can obtain the biggest and most expensive battleships shall be brought to a happy termination?

Mr. President, before I take my seat—and I shall not detain the Senate much longer—I wish to refer to one of the apprehensions, one of the so-called menaces, one of those dread, but nameless, menaces which are annually concentrated upon Congresses and chancelleries to the end that their purse strings may be opened in the interest of those who profit by battleship building. I refer to the charge that Japan is our natural enemy, which will at some time contend with us for the mastery of the Pacific, and which is looking with longing eyes upon our western slope; that that nation, ambitious, unscrupulous, and powerful, only waits the opportunity to invade the shores of the United States for the purpose of waging an offensive and destructive war of conquest; and that unless we have at hand a hugh army and a huge navy, which should be provided for now, at whatever cost, we shall, when it is too late, realize the fact that the destruction of the Republic is near at hand and that we could, if we would, have preserved it.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. THOMAS. I do

Mr. WEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question right there. It is not so much the fear of invasion of our western coast, is it, as it is the fear that the Japanese will obtain the Philippines? I will ask the Senator further if he does not think that is the thing that has given the great impetus to the increase in our armament for the last 10 or 12 years?

Mr. THOMAS. O, Mr. President, the only benefit to anybody that our accession of the Philippines has thus far conferred has been to give the war trust one more point to press home upon the apprehensions of the American people and enable them to get bigger appropriations for war and naval purposes. The greatest mistake that was ever made in the history of this country, or one of the greatest, was when Dewey, after destroying the Spanish fleet, failed to sail away from the harbor of Manila and leave that country to its own destinies. I say no, Mr. President; that is merely one of the pretenses for this enormous armament.

Why, Japan is the most terribly debt-burdened country that exists. Its indebtedness—and I can not give the exact amount—is greater than that of any other nation. The taxes, if my information is correct, amount to 25 per cent of valuation and of production. Tell me that a country so handicapped, however warlike, can possibly wage an offensive war against a great nation like ours; that a country so conditioned can be formidable to any distant land, whatever its feeling of hostility against that land may be!

It is true that in the event of hostilities the Philippines might fall an easy prey to a Japanese fleet, but that would be only the beginning of the end. The most remarkable part of this Japanese scare is involved in the notion that "an invading army of 150,000 men may be landed upon our shores overnight."

Has anybody ever calculated what that means—an army of 150,000 men transported 6,000 miles across the sea for the purpose of waging an offensive warfare against more than 90,000,000 people? How many vessels would it require to bring such an army of men over with their officers, their engineers, their medical and hospital and quartermasters' departments, their stands of small arms, their rounds of ammunition, their machine guns, their provisions, their field and siege artillery, the ammunition for them, their horses, their horse feed, medical supplies, tents and camp equipment, supply wagons, fuel for men-of-war and transports, aeroplanes, miners' and sappers' equipments, and so forth? Why, Mr. President, I am unable to say, but I believe that the amount of tonnage that would be required for the transportation of such an expedition passes comprehension.

Von Moltke once said that he had devised three satisfactory schemes for landing an army from Germany in England, to be transported less than 150 miles, but he was never able to devise a scheme for getting them out of there after they were once landed. Men are generally thoughtless. We are governed by our apprehensions, our fears, our prejudices, and not by our reason. Say "Japan" to any half a dozen men in the United States and it will come pretty near stampeding them; a fact well known to the War Trust at whose suggestion we rush into our committees here and vote millions in order to protect ourselves against this imaginary foe.

Why, Mr. President, such a thing as perfect preparedness for war is an impossibility. Thank God for it! The nation that comes nearest to being prepared for war in order that it may escape war is precisely the nation which in all probability will first be involved in war. The nations which are least prepared are more immune to-day from trouble than any others.

Was it the great armaments of France and Germany which kept those two nations from each other's throat over the Morocco incident? No, Mr. President; it was the common man of France and Germany meeting en masse and refusing to fight who served notice upon their respective Governments that war should not be. As far as people can be made to perceive—and, thank God, they are learning it—that it is they who fight the battles and pay the cost; that it is their children whose blood flows freely in case of armed conflict; and their children's children who pay interest upon the debts which war creates—these, Mr. President, are the surest modern safeguards against wars between the nations.

What is the real feeling of Japan toward this country? We are told that it is one of hostility. Everywhere is spread the contagious notion that the people of that nation are only waiting an opportunity to strike, and strike hard, because of the race question, so called, and for other causes of dissatisfaction which need only a spark to be fanned into a flame of war and of rapine.

Mr. President, I desire to read into the RECORD a part of the report made by Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie in 1913 to the trustees of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. I am aware of the fact that this institution is regarded with much disfavor by some of the Members of this body, who believe that it has been unduly interesting itself in the matter of canal tolls. Whether that be true or not, I shall not attempt to say; but I do wish to emphasize the fact that between a Carnegie endowment for peace and a war trust that is putting its slimy fingers in the pockets of every taxpayer in the world, I will cast my lot with the peace endowment.

This is what Mr. Mabie said concerning the attitude of the Japanese people toward ourselves:

> I desire to emphasize this quality because it is a national characteristic, and because the courtesy shown us was a courtesy to the American people whose representatives, in an informal way, we happened to be. It was an expression of a friendship for this country based on the consistent helpfulness of our National Government toward Japan and an expression of the feeling, widely prevalent, that there is a closer intellectual affinity between us and them than between any other eastern and western countries. The fairness of spirit and consideration for Japanese honor and interests shown by Commodore Perry, who secured access to the country 60 years ago, and by Mr. Townsend Harris, who a little later negotiated the first treaty between Japan and a foreign country, produced a deep and lasting impression on the Japanese people and laid the foundation of a genuine friendship for this country. It is my conviction that the Japanese are the only foreign people who have liked us as a Nation. Other people have liked individual Americans, but the Japanese have liked the United States. They hold the names of Perry and Harris in great honor, and a statue of Perry stands near the place where he landed.
> The attitude of the Japanese when the so-called anti-Japanese land legislation was before the California Legislature was highly significant. The stories of mobs in the streets of Tokyo "clamoring for war," which appeared in many newspapers in this country, were without foundation; the feeling was not belligerent; it was rather a feeling of keen disappointment that an old and tried friend had turned against Japan and had deliberately treated her as an inferior; an offense which this country would instantly have resented if the conditions had been reversed. The friendship of Japan has an importance in our future relations with the Far East which ignorance alone can ignore or undervalue.

We know, Mr. President, what the attitude of the Japanese people toward us was represented to be only a few short months ago, and we now know how false that representation was. What malign influence so misrepresented them, and for what purpose? If I continue to accuse my neighbor of unworthy motives; if I continue to suspect and to express my suspicion of his relations toward myself; if I constantly insinuate that he only wants an opportunity to take my life or destroy my property the time inevitably comes when a rupture occurs between that neighbor and myself; and my own conduct is largely, if not wholly, responsible for the unfortunate consequences. So it is with nations. If these interests so largely involved in the construction of battleships and furnishing munitions of war are to continue to plant the seeds of discord and distrust and enmity between the nations, they will do more toward kindling a state of war than all the other influences that can be resorted to and persisted in.

One more word, Mr. President, and I am done. I contend that the Navy which this Nation now possesses is more than ample for all of its present needs and the needs of its immediate future. We have more vessels to-day than we can man and officer. Mr. WITHERSPOON, one of the ablest men in public life, a gentleman who understands the naval situation not only of the United States but of all countries better, I believe, than any other man in Congress, has declared, if I remember his figures correctly, that the present Navy of the United States is short of equipment 3,000 officers and 6,000 men.

If we were obliged to mobilize every vessel we have to-morrow, we would not be able to do so because of the lack of officers and men. The two vessels provided by this bill will cost not less than $32,000,000, and will be completed, perhaps, about 1917 or 1918. Long before then Great Britain will have laid the keels for larger ones, and Germany and France; and so we, in order to keep up with the procession, will be required to do the same. When 1925 shall have arrived the most of us will have disappeared from the scene of active and possibly of actual life; but I should not be at all surprised but that a part of the naval appropriation bill would then provide for the sale of the vessels for which we are now providing because no longer available for our protection.

Mr. President, when is this mad expenditure of the public moneys going to cease? When will a condition of sanity overtake the American public mind? When will we awake to the fact that we are simply contributing millions of dollars to a world-wide combination dealing in everything that makes for human disaster, corrupting public officials and private individuals of influence all over the country and all over the world, and intent only upon increasing the vast accumulation of the millions which in the past 35 years it has garnered to itself? I am not only in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], but I shall also offer one going to the entire proposition as soon as a vote can be taken upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN].

Mr. VARDAMAN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Under "Increase of the Navy," it is proposed to strike out "two first-class battleships" and in lieu thereof to insert "one first-class battleship."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I will withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], but I understand if he were present he would vote as I would upon this amendment, and I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BRYAN (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] which I transfer to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask if the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair with that Senator and I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). Since I transferred my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] I observe that he has entered the Chamber. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably absent and that he is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. GALLINGER. I was requested to announce a pair between the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

So Mr. VARDAMAN'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, beginning with line 13, strike out all the remainder of page 56, together with all of pages 57 and 58.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On page 56, line 16, before the words "first-class battleships," I move to strike out "two" and insert "three."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, in February of this year, during the present session of Congress, Senate bill 4247 was passed, which provides for six vice admirals. The bill has been reported to the House with amendments, but on account of the congested condition of the calendar there it is feared that the bill may not be reached speedily. Inasmuch as the cause which called forth the bill in the first place is more apparent now than it was then, I offer as an amendment to this appropriation bill the bill already passed by the Senate, to come in at page 33, line 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

That the active list of the line of the Navy shall include the grade of vice admiral, which grade shall consist of six officers, four of whom shall be appointed within one year from the passage of this act, and the remainder shall be appointed as soon thereafter as practicable. Appointments to the grade of vice admiral shall be made by selection by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among officers on the active list of the line of the Navy who have served with credit in the grade of rear admiral in command of a fleet, squadron, division, or other command afloat: Provided, That no officer shall be appointed a vice admiral until his physical fitness to perform all the duties of that grade has been established to the satisfaction of a board of medical officers appointed by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided further, That any officer now or hereafter carried in the grade of rear admiral as an extra number shall cease to be an extra number if appointed a vice admiral: Provided further, That the total number of vice admirals and rear admirals shall not exceed the number of rear admirals of both grades now provided by law.

That the annual pay of vice admirals when on sea duty, or on shore duty beyond the continental limits of the United States, shall be $11,000; when not on such duty they shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of a rear admiral of the upper nine.

That vice admirals shall be placed on the retired list at the age of 65 years: Provided, That vice admirals on the retired list shall receive the pay allowed retired rear admirals of the upper nine.

That vice admirals shall be ordered to duty as commanders in chief of the United States Atlantic, Pacific, and Asiatic Fleets, or to such other duty as the Secretary of the Navy may direct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think that ought to take its regular course. I am opposed to yielding to the House and allowing them to neglect all our legislation unless we force it through on an appropriation bill. I make the point of order that the amendment is general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. JONES. I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 26, after the numerals "$155,000," insert:

building slip and equipment, $200,000.

Mr. THORNTON. I make the point of order against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Louisiana state his point of order? Upon what ground is it made?

Mr. THORNTON. The point of order is that there is no estimate for the amendment, and it is increasing the appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was about to say that the point of order should not be sustained, and I was about to submit a few remarks to the Chair upon it. It is in extension and in continuance of existing work, and it is a continuing appropriation.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. On page 29, line 23, I move to add $200 to the pay of the dental surgeon at Annapolis, because that officer becomes entitled to that increase on the 15th of November, owing to longevity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 23, add, after "$2,400," the words, "with longevity increase of $200, based on 15 years' service from November 9, 1914."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I offer an amendment, to come in on page 22, line 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, line 2, after the numerals "$425,000," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the laws relating to annual leave contained in section 7 of the legislative act approved March 15, 1898, and the deficiency act approved July 7, 1898, shall hereafter apply to classified civil-service per diem employees of the clerical, drafting, inspection, messenger, and watch forces at navy yards, naval stations, and other offices or stations under the Navy Department.

Mr. THORNTON. The department has advised the committee that that is utterly impracticable of accomplishment unless there should be an appropriation of about $15C,000 added to the bill. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. WARREN. Did I understand the Senator from Louisiana to make a point of order against the amendment?

Mr. THORNTON. I did not make a point of order. I dislike to make a point of order against a member of the committee who offers an amendment. I think it ought to come from some one else.

Mr. GALLINGER. In this connection, I want to express regret that I retired from the committee some time ago.

Mr. WARREN. I make the point of order, then, as I am not a member of the committee, that it is legislation.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill why it is that a member of the committee should have more consideration as to a point of order than any other Member of the Senate?

Mr. THORNTON. For myself I can give no other reason for it except simply as a matter of courtesy to a brother committeeman; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LODGE. I do not contest the point of order or the decision of the Chair. I ask that a statement in regard to the amendment which I send to the desk may be printed without reading. It simply shows why I have asked for the adoption of the amendment.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING LEAVE OF EMPLOYEES OF THE CLERICAL, DRAFTING, INSPECTION, MESSENGER, AND WATCH FORCES.

The leave of employees in the Navy Department is governed by the legislative act approved March 15, 1898, and the deficiency appropriation act of July 7, 1898. These acts give the head of a department authority to grant such employees 30 days' annual leave with pay and, under certain conditions, 30 days' sick leave in addition. (See departmental order No. 21, revised, attached hereto.) In the absence of restrictive legislation in regard to per annum employees at navy yards, etc., the above-mentioned laws are construed as governing their pay.

Section 1545 of the Revised Statutes restricts these laws from applying to per diem employees in navy yards.

The leave of per diem employees of the clerical, drafting, etc., forces at navy yards and stations is governed by the act of March 3, 1909. (See navy-yard order 198, fourth revision, p. 3, attached hereto.) This authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to grant all employees 15 days' leave with pay after they have served 12 consecutive months, and, in case of personal illness, 15 days more sick leave with pay may be given to meritorious cases.

The amendment proposed would give the per diem employees 15 days additional leave with pay, and, in certain cases, 15 days additional leave with pay in case of sickness.

The amount of the appropriation would probably not be increased by this amendment, as leave would either be given when work was slack or the other employees would have to work that much harder in turn.

Mr. LODGE. I have one other amendment which, personally and not as a committee amendment, I desire to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 17, insert the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the pay of electrical-expert aids and electrical experts in the classified service of the Navy be as follows: First class, $3,600 per annum; second class, $3,000 per annum; third class, $2,400 per annum; fourth class, $1,800 per annum.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to ask if that is estimated for.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no means of knowing.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator put that question to me?

Mr. WARREN. I will put it to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I regret to state that I think it is not estimated for.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment is clearly out of order, and I make the point of order against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer an amendment to be inserted after line 13, page 59.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, after line 13, insert:

That there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $8,600 for the correction of the acoustics of the United States Naval Academy chapel and auditorium, $6,000 for the chapel and $2,600 for the auditorium; the same to be immediately available and paid out upon the order of the Secretary of the Navy. A satisfactory bond shall be given by the contractors for the system in an amount to be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy conditioned upon the successful and satisfactory accomplishment of the improvement to the acoustics of the two buildings above mentioned. When the work is done and approved by a board composed of the chairmen of the two Naval Committees of Congress, the Secretary of the Navy, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, and a like number familiar with the problems involved to be named by the Secretary of the Navy, the final money shall be paid: Provided, however, That after the installation of the new system should the acoustics of the chapel and the auditorium be not satisfactory to the above-mentioned board the said contractor shall be required to restore the chapel and the auditorium to the condition in which they were before the alterations were undertaken, without any expense to the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, one word in explanation of this amendment. It is a bill introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and was reported favorably and passed by the Senate. We have already acted upon it. I feel no doubt about its merit, and there seems to be uncertainty with respect to its passage through the House as an independent measure. I have therefore offered it as an amendment, and I think it is a very proper one, to the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to say, Mr. President, that this amendment, I think, is clearly in order, because it is a bill that has passed the Senate, which relieves it from the point of order that it was not estimated for, and it is not general legislation. It is an appropriation for immediate purposes of the Navy.

Mr. CUMMINS. There has been no point of order made against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 58, after line 17, insert:

Any and all items which are appropriated for under the terms of this act shall be expended and accounted for in accordance with law. But the Secretary of the Navy, in estimating the actual cost of a ship built by the Government, may deduct from the cost of such ship as built under the appropriation therefor any sums which he deems not just to be charged thereto. This right to so estimate the cost of a ship shall, however, not be construed to affect any change in the purposes of the expenditures herein authorized.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I make the point of order against the amendment. It has been discussed over and over here to-day. I simply make the point of order.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I presume that the point of order is on the ground of general legislation. In discussing amendments proposed here yesterday to accomplish the same object the objection of general legislation was advanced, and the phraseology of those amendments seemed to lay them open to that objection. In this case the amendment provides nothing whatever save that which applies to an item of appropriation in this act. It is a temporary amendment because it is not general or permanent in its effect.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] yesterday objected to one of the amendments offered on the ground that the terms of that amendment would enable the Secretary of the Navy actually to change the applicability of the money appropriated under a given item of appropriation, and the Senator from Wyoming was absolutely correct, in my humble judgment, in making that objection. But the proposition here advanced is one to establish and solidify the operation of the action of the appropriating clauses of this bill and to make them so strong that even though the Secretary of the Navy does exercise his lawful right to make an estimate which may differ from these appropriations, yet he does not in any way affect these appropriations; this estimate may be made without getting him in trouble with the accounting officers of the Treasury Department. Therefore this amendment is absolutely germane to the items of this appropriation bill and is not general legislation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think the point of order is good, but I did not hear the first part of the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It all comes back to the construction of language, and, after all, one man's constructions is not another's. It reads:

Any and all items which are appropriated for under the terms of this act shall be expended and accounted for in accordance with law.

That is the first clause. The Chair assumes that if anything becomes a part of this act, it is a law.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. After the words "in accordance," I desire to modify the amendment so as to read, "shall be expended and accounted for in accordance therewith," and omit the words "in accordance with law."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if I understand the proposed amendment correctly, it gives the Secretary of the Navy authority to deduct items of cost on a ship constructed in the navy yards if, in his judgment, they ought to be deducted. Is that correct?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. And without affecting the items of this appropriation act; without affecting his accounting status before the Treasury Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. Ought there not, to make the matter equitable, be some person designated to do the same thing for a ship constructed in a private yard?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that the ship-constructing concerns will do that for themselves, and get it here.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but it would not have the force and effect that it would have if it came from the Secretary of the Navy. Perhaps he had better do it in both cases.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It has had a good deal of force and effect up to date, and it is only fair to suggest that some one person—the Secretary of the Navy—had better take care of the public interest involved in such estimates, as the other side seems amply able to take care of itself.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was interested the other day in listening to a debate in which two Senators, both well informed, differed very widely as to the cost of the construction of a ship in the navy yards. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] gave some statistics which seemed to be convincing as they were read, and some other Senator—I have forgotten which. Senator it was—gave another list of expenditures, which differed very widely from those given by the Senator from Wisconsin. They both, I think, claimed that they were reasonably authoritative. Now, it occurs to me that if we lodge in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy the power—and I do not speak of the present Secretary of the Navy, for if we do it once we will probably do it again—to deduct from the cost of a ship in the navy yards any charges that in his opinion seem fair and just to be deducted, it is rather a dangerous power, because it is reasonably well known that there are those in official life, both here and in the Navy Department, who are partisans for the building of ships in the navy yards, and while they probably would not do an unfair thing if they were aware of it, yet their prejudices run in that direction and they would try to make the cost of building a ship in a navy yard as low as possible. Is it not safe enough to leave it, I will ask the Senator, as it now is, to let the laws and principles governing transactions of that kind apply and to let each Senator or each Member of the other body determine for himself whether or not the charges are fair and just?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] made a suggestion here yesterday pretty much along the line of the one which the Senator from New Hampshire now makes, that the Secretary of the Navy ought to go right ahead, and when he is going to repair a dock or a navy yard that he ought to so state and apply the money.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Maryland is very much mistaken. I never suggested at any time in my life that the Secretary of the Navy should vary the application of the money from the application provided for by Congress. I never entertained such a thought or expressed such an idea. It is obligatory upon the Secretary of the Navy to expend the money in accordance with the purposes for which the money was appropriated.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. That was what interested me so much in the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, because I did not see how the Secretary of the Navy could go ahead and make an application that was not authorized by law or was not under the accounting system of the Treasury Department considered as being authorized by law.

Now, it is perfectly obvious that this expression "appropriated for the building of a ship" has from time immemorial in the Navy been construed to cover all of the incidents that went with the building of that ship. In olden times they had ship houses where they worked in the winter in the building of ships in a northern climate; perhaps they had cradles and all the essentials that went to holding together the structure, and the repair of those facilities which now are dockyards and parts of docks and yards. Such items were charged and probably will continue to be charged to the building of the ship; and yet the United States must have yards and docks, places in which to build and repair ships, looking forward to the inevitable possibilities of war, when it must repair its ships, and repair them efficiently and speedily. Under those circumstances the United States must have these places; it must have its navy yards; it must have its docks. It is not fair, therefore, to charge the maintenance of the yards and the docks which the Government must have to the construction of ships, even though under the terms of this law and of previous laws such expenditures are made out of the money appropriated for the building of a ship. That is where the whole difficulty arises; that is where the whole confusion exists. So it is impossible for the public to get any definite conception or for the Secretary of the Navy to make any statement in behalf of the Navy, or for any competition to be started between two navy yards that will actually show what the ships built by the Government actually cost the Government to construct. That is the object of the amendment, to state cost of shipbuilding without regard to other items; and the amendment is so drawn that it clearly does not come under the objection of being general legislation. It simply permits the Secretary of the Navy to do this thing, and prevents his so doing from interfering with the terms of this appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it occurs to me that it practically delegates legislative power to the Secretary of the Navy; but, however that may be, I will say that with some hesitation I voted on yesterday to build one of the proposed battleships in a Government navy yard. In doing so, however, I voted the conviction, at least, that the navy yard would be given no advantage over a private concern in the matter of cost. If it shall develop, and can be satisfactorily shown, that it costs any considerable amount more to build ships in navy yards my inclination would be to vote against building ships in the navy yards, although I am a friend of the yards; I am a friend of the workingmen there employed, and I should like to keep them occupied; but, after all, we must take a broader view than that. I will simply content myself by saying that I think this is rather a dangerous power to put in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy; and, while it might not be abused to any great extent, yet there is an apprehension, in my mind at least, that we might regret having indorsed legislation such as has been suggested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to ask the Senator from Maryland whether this clause—

This right to so estimate the cost of a ship shall, however, not be construed to effect any change in the purposes of the expenditures herein authorized—is meant to authorize, or is understood as authorizing, the Secretary of the Navy in the construction of a ship to charge to some other appropriation under this bill anything that may either go into the ship or may necessarily be erected or utilized for the purpose of constructing the ship?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I should say not. It simply authorizes the Secretary of the Navy, as it were, to cancel that latter type of expenditure with reference to the computation of the actual cost of the ship. It does not in any sense affect what he must do under the terms of this act, but, quite the contrary, it is intended to preserve the terms of this act, even should the Secretary exercise the right, which he probably could exercise to-day, of deducting certain items from the cost of the construction of a ship in making an estimate of strict construction costs. Suppose he did make such a deduction, Mr. President, what would be the effect of it? It would complicate the $7,800,000 appropriated for the battleship; that is all; and without authorization for such estimated reduction he might have to ask for a deficiency appropriation or something of that kind.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. LEE of Maryland. If the Senator will excuse me for one moment, I wish to add that for this reason this amendment tends to strengthen and protect the provisions of this act.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Maryland a question. I am not familiar at all with the operations of our navy yards or with the construction of ships, and I want to ask the Senator from Maryland, in view of this amendment, whether or not it has been the custom in our navy yards to reckon or charge up against the cost of the construction of a ship any items of expense that do not properly there belong?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I infer from the general drift of this debate that that has been the fact.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say, unhesitatingly, yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That being the case, I should like to know what those items of construction may be that have been improperly charged to the account of the ship? That is the purpose of my inquiry.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I think the Senator's question is entirely too comprehensive to be answered without consultation with the responsible authorities of the Navy; but it is perfectly obvious that there have been substantial items included in the cost of these ships that tend to create a fictitious appearance of expenditure that somebody wants to keep as a cloud over the situation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then, it seems to me, Mr. President, that some action ought to be taken in regard to the officers of our Department of the Navy who make charges against the construction of a ship that do not properly there belong. It does not seem to me that it is a difficulty which we can guard against by law, but it is something for which the officers responsible should be "jacked up."

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I do not think it is possible for anybody to answer the question propounded by the Senator from Wyoming, at least within the limits of ordinary debate; but there is no doubt that costs have been juggled in various yards, and not necessarily with any improper motive. In fact, I do not know of anything more difficult right now than to perfect a correct system of cost keeping in connection with Government construction. I am certain that I myself would not attempt to install a method of fixing costs, and I do not know of anybody who could do so.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; but if the Senator himself were running a shipyard and building a ship, I have an idea that he would know exactly what that ship cost to turn out.

Mr. HUGHES. I would.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And I do not see how there is any great difficulty, when the Government itself constructs a ship, of ascertaining, as a matter of fact, exactly what the cost of that ship is.

Mr. HUGHES. There are greater difficulties, I will say to Senators in connection with Government construction than in connection with private construction. If I went into the shipbuilding business to-morrow, the first thing I would have to do would be to buy real estate, and on that real estate I would have to construct buildings. Then I would have to install machinery. My bills would show me what that cost was; but the Government is in a different position, and when an attempt is made to discover the overhead costs that should be charged to the Government, experts will differ as to what should properly be included. As I said on another occasion, I remember one instance where overhead charges were juggled to such an extent that a $300 pump was made, apparently, to cost the Government $1,500.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Well, that comes right back to the statement that I made before, that it is altogether the fault and crime of the officer who makes the computation, and we can not by legislation of this sort correct that.

Mr. HUGHES. I would not say that it was a fault or a crime.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think it is a fault or a crime for any public official to juggle figures in the discharge of his duty. I use the same term the Senator used.

Mr. HUGHES. I would not say that it was a fault or a crime; it may have been a mistake; it may have been a mistake in judgment and it may have been for a perfectly proper purpose at the time; but it would not matter very much what the cost was if we were familiar with the method of obtaining the cost figures. What we need is some standard system of accounting.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HUGHES. I do.

Mr. WEST. In the overhead charges in connection with the construction of a battleship ought not part of the upkeep and deterioration of the plant be included?

Mr. HUGHES. Of course; but I was not speaking of a battleship in particular. There is an infinite variety of articles that are made at navy yards, with reference to which it is much more difficult to fix overhead charges and costs than it would be in the case of a battleship.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have heard a number of Senators discuss the same question heretofore, but it does not seem to me that it should be difficult for the Government in running a factory, in constructing battleships or anything else, to ascertain the overhead charges, any more than it would be for a private concern to do so. The only difference would be that the Government has not the real estate to purchase, perhaps, and therefore its overhead charges would not include the interest upon the real-estate investment; but all business men know what are the overhead charges of any business. They are charges that are to be paid by the business, but which do not of themselves create a portion of the product of the plant, such as taxes, such as secretaries, bookkeepers, foremen, managers, and everything that has to be paid for by the institution which does not enter into the direct making of the article itself.

The Government can ascertain such charges just as well as can a private concern. It does seem to me that if there has been any juggling of figures in the past that it is wrong; and there is no necessity for it. It has not been done for any good purpose, nor to arrive at any real information as to the cost of producing any article.

Mr. HUGHES. I agree in the main with the Senator. It should be easy enough for the Government to arrive at what the overhead charges really are.

Mr. PAGE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says, very properly perhaps, that it is perfectly easy to tell what are and what are not overhead charges. I think he is mistaken on that point.

Mr. SMOOT. I never found any trouble in doing so.

Mr. PAGE. For instance, in building a large battleship you may be compelled to put in a lot of new machinery for building that particular ship. The question then arises in the mind of the manufacturer, is that machinery something that he will be likely to use in making another ship hereafter, or will the use for that added machinery terminate when he builds the one ship? It is a matter which every manufacturer has to consider with a great deal of care.

Mr. HUGHES. That is true.

Mr. PAGE. It has been said that a man can invoice himself rich or poor in his income each year according as he is willing to be conservative or otherwise with regard to his overhead charges.

Mr. HUGHES. Undoubtedly that is true, and that is one of the difficulties; but that difficulty confronts the private manufacturer just as it confronts the Government. The comptroller's decision was made on that very question.

The Senator has cited an instance which is of rather common occurrence, I imagine. I remember that at one time Congress appropriated a large sum of money for the purchase of a crane for the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and the particular type of ship which they were about to build could not be constructed unless they had this crane. The manufacture and installation of the crane cost a tremendous sum of money. It is quite within the bounds of possibility that the navy yard could have been employed immediately after the construction of the ship for which the crane was purchased in the construction of smaller craft for which the crane would have been absolutely useless. The question, then, at once confronted the man who was making up the overhead cost on the smaller type of craft which did not need the crane, whether that tremendously expensive equipment should be charged partly against them or whether it should all have been charged against the battleship.

Whatever the ship may be, however, there ought to be a system; and whatever it is, we ought to know what it is, and we ought to know what it is in detail, because without any question of crime or fault, but perhaps only through a mistake of judgment, an officer of the Navy might charge all of the overhead expense either against the big ship or against the smaller ships and do injustice, as far as the particular piece of construction is concerned, to one or the other.

Mr. SMOOT. The trouble about that is that the crane should not have been charged to either ship. It was machinery, and it should have been charged to that account, and not to overhead expenses.

Mr. HUGHES. That is the Senator's judgment. That perhaps might be my judgment, but that might not have been the judgment of the officer who assigned the particular charge. Whatever is done, we ought to know how it is done, and there ought to be some way for us to settle this long-mooted question with reference to the cost of the construction of battleships by the Government.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. It seems to me we are getting far afield. The question is not as to cranes; the question is whether this is proper legislation in an appropriation bill.

Mr. HUGHES. I am anxious to have the Government put in a position to install some method whereby Congress can tell something about these overhead charges. I am not altogether familiar with the amount of law we have on the subject at the present time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the very argument the Senator is using——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will state his point of order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has this amendment been submitted to the Senate by the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I make the point of order that the debate is out of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hope the Chair will permit me to say a word on the question of order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. I thought I had the floor to address myself for a moment to the point of order. I have no objection to yielding, of course.

Mr. REED. I did not know the Senator intended to address himself to it. I simply did not want to——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas makes a point of order, and asks whether this discussion is going on under a submission of the question to the Senate. The Chair has no intention of submitting it to the Senate. The Chair intends to rule on this question.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I insist on the point of order, that the debate is out of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the point of order yet been made against the proposed amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I insist on the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As there probably will be an appeal from the ruling, the Chair will rule, and then there will be an opportunity——

Mr. GALLINGER. If I may be permitted a word, Mr. President, it is competent for the Chair to hear argument, if the Chair sees fit to do so, on the point of order. Now, is it competent for a Senator, while the Chair is permitting that privilege, to make a point of order against the debate? The Chair can terminate it at any moment.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I was discussing the merits of the proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; the point of order was not being discussed.

Mr. HUGHES. I was speaking without any strict right to do so, and I therefore have no objection to the interpo tion of the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Senator from Texas was not objecting to the Chair's hearing Senators upon the point of order, but was objecting to the general discussion of the amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I insist on the point of order, that the debate is out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. While the Chair is ready to rule, the Chair will hear what the Senator from Wyoming has to say.

Mr. WARREN. I have only a word to say on the point of order. Of course, the matter is very much the same as the one that came up yesterday. It is simply an effort to get under the fence instead of going through it. In this particular amendment we are delegating legislative power to the Secretary of the Navy, which would be, of course, against our rules. This is not estimated for. Besides that, it is general legislation, and it strikes at the very fundamental rule of appropriation bills in that it seeks to give the Secretary of the Navy authority to use money appropriated for one purpose to expend it on another.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear from the Senator from Missouri, who desires to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may the amendment be stated from the desk?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 58, after line 17, it is proposed to insert:

Any and all items which are appropriated for under the terms of this act shall be expended and accounted for in accordance therewith and in accordance with law; but the Secretary of the Navy, in estimating the actual cost of a ship built by the Government, may deduct from the cost of such ship as built under the appropriation therefor any sums which he deems not just to be charged thereto. This right to so estimate the cost of a ship shall, however, not be construed to effect any change in the purposes of the expenditures herein authorized.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the point of order that this is general legislation, if it is sustained, I think goes further than we ought to go.

I understand the distinction between general legislation and legislation with reference to the particular appropriation before the Congress to be that you can not, under the guise of an appropriation, attach to it some legislation of a general character—that is, of a character which goes beyond the general purpose of the appropriation—but that you can change the direction of the appropriation, you can add conditions to the appropriation, you can raise the appropriation, or you can lower it.

If I am sound in that, then the point of order, I think, is not well taken.

Let me illustrate. We bring in an appropriation for $50,000 for a certain item. Nobody questions the fact that you can increase that appropriation or you can lower that appropriation here in the Senate, and you are not out of order when you do so.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator certainly does not mean that we can exceed the estimates—that anyone on the floor of the Senate can move an amendment to exceed the estimates for any or all objects of expenditure and still be in order?

Mr. REED. I am discussing the other question.

Mr. WARREN. The rule in regard to points of order is specific, to the effect that we can not exceed the estimates for the several items of appropriation in an appropriation bill, unless the item sought to be increased has gone to a committee and has been properly recommended by the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to proceed on the question whether this is general legislation or not, I will come to the other question later. I can not discuss both of them at once.

You can raise an appropriation without being guilty of violating the rule against general legislation; you can lower it; you can provide for the expenditure of the appropriation in a particular way as long as the particular way in which it is to be expended comes within the general purview and object of the appropriation itself. If you could not do that, then the Senate never could amend an appropriation bill, and the House could not amend certain bills which we might pass.

The distinction between general legislation and legislation which affects the particular item is a very plain one in most instances. You can not take an appropriation bill and put in legislation which affects other matters than the appropriation, because that is general legislation; but when you simply affect the appropriations that are provided for it is not general legislation; it is legislation that is confined to the subject matter of the bill, and to the very item you are considering.

Who is there who will dispute that if we were appropriating money for the purpose of building a battleship we could say that in the building of that ship certain plans and specifications should be followed? It is part of the appropriation. It is part of the very purpose of the appropriation. We are simply directing how the appropriation shall be expended. It would be quite a different thing, however, to add to an appropriation for a battleship a provision relating to agriculture, because that is legislation of a general character.

I maintain that as long as the qualification which we add by way of an amendment bears direct relation to the expenditure of the particular money that is appropriated and comes within the general objects of that appropriation, it is not general legislation at all.

Mr. WARREN. But, Mr. President, the appropriations already made in the bill are for specific objects, each one having its own amount of money and its use. This amendment proposes, in one of the sections, to assemble all of those and make them accessible to draw on for entirely different purposes from those for which we have made the appropriations.

Mr. REED. Accordingly, I claim that when the Senate is called upon to vote six or seven million dollars for a battleship it can lay down the rule by which that money is to be expended without being guilty of general legislation. It is not general; it is special. It is a special direction and qualification applied to that particular item of appropriation. It is a mere limitation upon the appropriation.

I wish first to try to make that point plain, if I am correct in it. I may be in error, but I feel very confident of it. Then I wish to proceed to the other questions that have been raised by the Senator.

In the Precedents of the Senate, at page 54, is this item:

No subject is more widely discussed in the Senate during the consideration of appropriation bills and amendments thereto than the question, "What is general legislation on a general appropriation bill?"

The Century Dictionary says:

"General legislation, that legislation which is applicable throughout the State generally, as distinguished from special legislation, which affects only particular persons or localities."

"Or a particular subject matter" might have been added.

"Local legislation, local statute, such legislation or statute as is in terms applicable, not to the State at large, but only to some district or locality and to the people therein."

Bouvier (vol. 1, p. 877): "General law (legislation), laws which apply to and operate uniformly upon all members of any class of persons, places, or things, requiring legislation peculiar to themselves in the matters covered by the laws." "Statutes which relate to persons and things as a class. Laws that are framed in general terms, restricted to no locality, and operating equally upon all of a group of objects which, having regard to the purpose of the legislation, are distinguished by characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them a class by themselves."

Now, a little further:

"'General,' with reference to the subject matter of the statute, is synonymous with 'public' and opposed to 'private,' but with reference to the extent of territory over which it is to operate, is opposed to 'local' * * * and means that the statute to which it applies operates throughout the whole of the territory subject to the legislative jurisdiction." * * * "Further, when used in antithesis to 'special,' it means relating to all of a class instead of to men only of that class." * * * "In deciding whether or not a given law is general, the purpose of the act and the objects on which it operates must be looked to * * *."

I take it that applying that language—which, of course, was written by law writers with reference to statutory law rather than to a point of order—it means that the philosophy of it is this: Whenever an amendment is offered which is not confined to the purposes of the appropriation bill and does not undertake to regulate and control the appropriation bill, but goes outside of that and undertakes to regulate other subjects, it becomes general legislation. But as long as it is confined to the subject which is embraced within the appropriation bill, and directs how the particular appropriation shall be expended, how the books shall be kept, how the accounting shall be had, it is a part of the appropriation bill. It is not general in its character; it is special in its nature; and therefore it is not subject to the point which has been raised.

Now, there are a number of decisions under the different subheads in which this question is discussed. On the Agricultural appropriation bill, in the Fifty-first Congress, on a reported amendment to the Agricultural bill, which reads:

That any manufacturer of sugar from sorghum may remove from distillery warehouses to factories used solely for the manufacture of such sugar from sorghum distilled spirits in bond free of tax—

And so forth. The Senate by a vote of 29 to 23 decided that it was not general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, does the Senator lay great stress upon the decision of the Senate upon a point of order?

Mr. REED. I hope we will be able to lay greater stress as the years go on.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. REED. I am citing it for just what it is worth. I have no lamp by which my feet are guided except the lamp of precedent.

Mr. GALLINGER. But has not the Senator observed that the Senate frequently decides a point of order without very much reference to the rules?

Mr. REED. I think too often.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so.

Mr. REED. I admit the value of the Senator's criticism, and therefore I am appealing to the Senate that it now decide this question upon its real merit, not to decide it upon the question whether they want the amendment to pass or not to pass.

Manifestly the citation I have given, if it be good parliamentary law, would admit this amendment, because you will observe that that was an amendment which did not either raise or lower the appropriation, but it added to the bill itself a direction as to the handling of the subject matter with reference to which the appropriation was made.

In the Sixtieth Congress I find this note:

On the question to agree to the reported amendment on page 55, after line 23, viz: "Commission on Country Life: For all necessary expenses to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to digest, compile, and publish the material already gathered by the Commission on Country Life, including the employment of the necessary clerical assistance in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $25,000."

Mr. Kean raised a question of order, viz, that the amendment as amended proposed general legislation to a general appropriation bill, and was therefore not in order.

You will observe that while this amendment had relation to the subject matter for which money was being appropriated and appropriated an additional sum of money, it went further and created a commission, and yet it was held by a vote of the Senate that that could be done. It added a new proposition.

If you can raise the amount or lower the amount, then you ought to be allowed to do those things necessary to the proper raising or the proper lowering or the proper expenditure of that amount. It is not general legislation because it applies to the particular subject matter included within the appropriation bill.

Is it possible that if the House of Representatives sends us a bill appropriating money for six battleships the Senate could not add an amendment requiring one or more of those vessels to be built according to certain plans and specifications or to be built in a Government yard or to carry an armament of a certain size? That is not general legislation. It is legislation which has to do solely and alone with the question how the money is to be expended which we are then and there appropriating. It is not necessary to go as far as was gone in this precedent in order to add these qualifications to the expenditure of the money which we may desire to add.

Under appropriations for the Army in the Fifty-sixth Congress the amendment which was offered was as follows:

All military, civil, and judicial powers necessary to govern the Philippine Islands acquired from Spain by the treaties concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898, and at Washington on the 7th day of November, 1900, shall, until otherwise provided by Congress, be vested in such person and persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct for the establishment of civil government and for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of said islands in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion: Provided, That all franchises granted under the authority hereof shall contain a reservation of the right to alter, amend, or repeal the same.

Mr. Pettus raised a point of order, namely, that the amendment proposed general legislation to a general appropriation bill, and was therefore not in order, under the third clause of Rule XVI.

The President pro tempore submitted the question to the Senate, and the Senate decided the amendment to be in order by a vote of 39 to 23.

I am frank to say, without having examined the bill itself, but assuming it to be a mere appropriation bill, it seems to me that this particular decision went too far. It seems to me that the subject with reference to which Congress was then legislating probably was enlarged by this particular amendment; but it goes to show that the hard and fast rule that the Senate can do nothing to an appropriation bill except to pass it is not the correct rule.

Mr. President, I do not know that I have succeeded at all in making the point that I have in mind clear to the Senate. It seems to me to be clear. I maintain that the term "general legislation" means that class of legislation which does not have relation to the appropriation, which does not provide for the method of its expenditure, which does not provide for the character of accounting, but proposes to go outside of the subject matter and engage in the enactment of some general law which is not confined to the appropriation; but as long as you are confining the question to the appropriation, and determining how the appropriation shall be expended, it is not general legislation.

Accordingly, I hold that if the House of Representatives were to send us a bill containing an appropriation for the purpose of building a fortification at one end of the canal, and the Senate should add a provision that no part of the money shall be expended until a treaty of a certain kind shall have been negotiated, it would not be general legislation, because it affects that particular appropriation. We could provide that no part of the money should be expended for a given time, and it would not be general legislation, because is affected that particular appropriation. But if the bill said nothing whatever in regard to an appropriation for the canal, and was dealing with an entirely different subject, and then we sought to provide that no money should be expended to put in fortifications at the canal until certain treaties had been negotiated, it would be of a general character, and might be subject to a point of order.

Mr. President, so far as that is concerned, I think that is clear. There is another question which has been raised here in regard to the estimates not having been made. There is not a dollar that will be affected by this amendment that has not been estimated for and is not covered by the present estimates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is more general legislation than is embraced in the definition of general legislation in Bouvier's Law Dictionary, and some of the things that are defined as general legislation in that dictionary have been held by the courts not to be general legislation.

The Chair is quite satisfied that the ruling of the Chair yesterday upon the amendments as presented then were correct. There is a statute of the United States of America which is applicable to all the officers of the Government, and consequently a general statute, because it applies to a class of people, declaring that they shall not make any expenditure of public money except in accordance with an appropriation made by the Congress of the United States and after an estimate therefor. That is not the exact language, but that is the substance of the statute.

The amendments presented yesterday simply struck out every appropriation in this naval bill and made a lump sum of it and turned it over to the Secretary of the Navy to expend as he pleased, using his own judgment as to what should be done with this fund, that fund, and the other fund, if any charge was to be made at all. But the amendment presented to-day is of a different character. The Chair has very carefully read this amendment, and takes into consideration in ruling upon it the statement of the Senator from Maryland that it is not his intention in the amendment to suffer or permit the Secretary of the Navy to add a dollar for any single purpose except as the same has been appropriated in this bill, and that the sole purpose of the amendment is to permit the Secretary of the Navy hereafter, if he chooses to do so, to make an estimate as to the actual cost of a ship; in other words, to permit him, according to his opinion, to deduct from the $7,800,000 appropriated for one of these ships any sums of money which he thinks ought not to have been legitimately charged up to that ship. But the amendment does not permit him to shift the different appropriations in the bill or to extend it otherwise than the bill itself provides.

The amendment does not, therefore, seem to the Chair to be general legislation. It appears to be simply a special permission in the bill given to the Secretary of the Navy, if he chooses to avail himself of it, to estimate what, in his opinion, one of these battleships did actually cost.

It is not for the Chair to say what value such an estimate as that may have in the future. That is no business of the Chair. The Chair believes that the amendment simply authorizes the Secretary of the Navy at any time when he wants to say what one of these ships cost to deduct from the items that he has paid out in the construction of the ship such items as he thinks ought not to have been legitimately charged against the building of the ship. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the construction that the Presiding Officer gives the amendment is different from what I understood from the portion that I heard read, and as we all ought to know what it is the Chair decided I ask that the Secretary may read the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it again. If the Chair believed that the amendment would authorize the Secretary of the Navy to expend any one of the items estimated for and contained in the bill otherwise than as the appropriation is made in the bill, the Chair would sustain the point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment. There was a modification made by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WARREN. I wish it read as it is now before the Senate. I understand from what the Chair has stated that it merely gives to the Secretary the power to estimate what was its cost.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That, in the opinion of the Chair, is what the amendment really means. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Any and all items which are appropriated for under the terms of this act shall be expended for and accounted for in accordance therewith. But the Secretary of the Navy, in estimating the actual cost of a ship built by the Government, may deduct from the cost of such ship as built under the appropriation therefor any sums which he deems not just to be charged thereto. This right to so estimate the cost of a ship shall, however, not be construed to affect any change in the purposes of the expenditures herein authorized.

Mr. WARREN. It seems to me that the Senator who offers the amendment should qualify it a little further and say that the Secretary may deduct from the estimated cost. That can be easily effected by adding a word. It reads:

But the Secretary of the Navy in estimating the actual cost of a ship built by the Government may deduct from the cost.

I think it should read that he "may deduct from the estimated cost."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to that modification?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I object to it for the reason that the cost is the legal cost, and the estimated cost is what we are trying to get at. The cost is provided by this appropriation bill, and to use any other expression would be antagonistic to the appropriation. That is particularly what I am trying to avoid.

Mr. WARREN. The language is a little ambiguous if you do not expect to spend any money and only estimate it. That is the suggestion I have to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. I offer an amendment as a separate paragraph, to come in on page 61, between lines 7 and 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, after line 7, insert:

That for the purpose of obviating the growing expenditures by the powers of the world to maintain the military forces of such powers, and to reduce such expenditures, and to secure an agreement by all the formidable nations of the world for the immediate suspension of the present naval-construction program, the President be, and is hereby, empowered to invite delegates from the countries of the world to meet in Washington, in the District of Columbia, in the United States, during the autumn months of the year 1914, to deliberate upon and to take action to secure the approval of such agreement; and to provide for the reception of said delegates and to carry out on the part of the United States the terms and conditions of such agreement a sum sufficient in amount therefor, not exceeding $5,000, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay said sum to the Secretary of State for the disbursement of the same for said purposes.

Mr. THORNTON. I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. KENYON. What is the point of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not advised as to what is the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. It is general legislation, and it is an unestimated item proposed on an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 26, line 24, after the numerals "$100,000," it is proposed to insert:

For fuel-oil storage, at some point accessible to the oil fields of Texas and Oklahoma, to be determined by the Secretary of the Navy, $150,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I make the point of order against that amendment, that it is not estimated for, and that bill contains a provision for storage tanks. This is proposing to vote unobligated balances for a purpose not estimated for.

Mr. GORE. The Senator misapprehends the amendment. I ask that it be again stated, and I hope the Senator will not interpose a point of order against it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. GORE.

Mr. LODGE. I did not misapprehend the amendment. It proposes an item which is certainly not estimated for. Fuel-oil storage is provided for in the bill; every item that was estimated for is there; and this item is not estimated for. The committee knew nothing about it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the reason I made the suggestion that the Senator from Massachusetts misapprehended the amendment was the fact that I had offered another amendment which used language which the Senator began to quote. I will say to the Senator that the bill does make provision for the storage of oil at some point in Rhode Island and at Norfolk, in Virginia; I think at the latter place making an appropriation of $150,000 and at the former $20,000. The bill also makes an appropriation for the storage of oil on Puget Sound, carrying $105,000; an appropriation of $100,000 for the storage of oil at San Francisco; and $50,000, I believe, for the storage of oil at San Diego, Cal. There is, however, no provision made for the storage of oil at any point on the Gulf of Mexico. There is at least a remote possibility that there may be some occasion for the use of oil in that vicinity; and as the point referred to in the amendment is in the vicinity of one of the largest oil fields in the United States, it had seemed to me that it would be wise and expedient to provide for the storage of oil in that locality. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, I have no objection to having one oil storage tank put on the Gulf, if it is thought to be necessary. It is not estimated for, but I am perfectly willing to withdraw the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is withdrawn, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I renew the point of order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I propose to offer an amendment, which I shall send to the desk. Before the amendment is read, however, I desire to call the attention of Senators to a change that I think should be made in the bill. On page 60 there is a provision, beginning at line 9, which reads as follows:

Of each of the sums appropriated by this act, except such amounts as may be required to meet obligations authorized in previous acts and for which contracts have been made, no part shall be used to procure through purchase or contract any vessels, armament, articles, or materials which the navy yards, gun factories, or other industrial plants operated by the Navy Department are equipped to supply.

The provision is that no such purchases shall be made if the navy yards are equipped to supply them. Then follow several exceptions, and among them are the following:

Unless such Government plants are operated approximately at their full capacity for not less than one regular shift each working day, except when contract costs are less than costs in said Government plants, and except when said Government plants are unable to complete the work within the time required, and except in cases of emergency.

The purpose of the amendment which I shall have read is that no such purchases shall be made elsewhere, provided the Navy Department can supply them, except when the Government plants are unable to complete the work within the time required, and in cases of emergency. I think those two exceptions are sufficient, and that they should not be extended by the other exceptions, by which, taking them as the words apparently mean, the power is conferred upon the head of the Navy Department in any case to go outside and make his purchases if this language is to be retained.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to hear the amendment. I confess I do not understand it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, beginning in line 16, after the words "Government plants," it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Are operated approximately at their full capacity for not less than one regular shift each working day, except when contract costs are less than costs in said Government plants, and except when said Government plants—

So that, if so amended, the paragraph will read:

Of each of the sums appropriated by this act, except such amounts as may be required to meet obligations authorized in previous acts and for which contracts have been made, no part shall be used to procure through purchase or contract any vessels, armament, articles, or materials which the navy yards, gun factories, or other industrial plants operated by the Navy Department are equipped to supply, unless such Government plants are unable to complete the work within the time required, and except in cases of emergency.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not oppose the amendment, but I should like to call the attention of the Senator proposing it to page 18, line 18, and the language following, which reads:

Purchase and manufacture of smokeless powder, $1,150,000: Provided, That no part of any money appropriated by this act shall be expended for the purchase of powder other than small-arms powder at a price in excess of 53 cents a pound:

But the crux of the case is in the following language:

Provided further, That in expenditures of this appropriation, or any part thereof, for powder, no powder shall at any time be purchased unless the powder factory at Indianhead, Md., shall be operated on a basis of not less than its full maximum capacity.

I only suggest that the same attention which the Senator is giving to the paragraph which he proposes to correct should be given, I think, to that.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I see no inconsistency between those two provisions. They can be read together and are quite in harmony.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York.

Mr. SWANSON. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is general legislation.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not know——

Mr. LODGE. The amendment proposes to strike out the text of the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. The provision proposed to be stricken out is a statute and has been carried in the law for a long time. It is simply, as I understand, a reiteration of the existing law, and is carried in the appropriation bill every year.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator offer that as a reason in support of his point of order?

Mr. SWANSON. The provision affects the conditions under which the Government can do its own work. We have appropriated $500,000 for a powder plant; and it seems to me the Government ought to operate it to its fullest extent, except when powder can be purchased elsewhere. I do not know the purpose of the amendment or the effect of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know either; but the Chair thinks that a motion to strike out from the bill is always in order.

Mr. SWANSON. Not if it is a general statute which is proposed to be stricken out and the amendment changes existing law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The language could be stricken out of the bill without being stricken out of the statute.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may be heard for one moment on the point of order, the provision which the Senator from New York seeks to strike out is a part of the House bill and is open, of course, to amendment in any form, to strike out, to change, or to in any way modify.

Mr. SWANSON. The point I make is this: As I understand, this provision is a general law governing certain purchases made by the Government; it is a general statute, and is simply carried in the appropriation bill. The amendment of the Senator from New York would change existing law in connection with Government purchases and Government work.

Mr. LODGE. It is a provision carried in the Naval appropriation bill from year to year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is not well taken. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I offer another amendment, to which the attention of the Senate was called a day or so ago by the Senator from Iowa. On page 58, beginning at line 18, there is this provision:

The Secretary of the Navy shall build any of the vessels herein authorized in such navy yards as he may designate, should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, and unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels.

I seek to amend that by providing that "except where otherwise directed" the Secretary of the Navy may do so and so. If the language remains as it is on page 58, he might have a power which would nullify an express provision on a preceding page instructing him with respect to the construction of the two battleships.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 58, line 18, before the words "Secretary of the Navy," it is proposed to insert "except where otherwise directed," so as to read:

Except where otherwise directed the Secretary of the Navy shall build—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the advisability of the Government establishing an armor-plate plant or of adopting the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy that we should provide for the Government furnishing and refining its own oil for the use of battleships, I am sure that there can not be any difference of opinion among Senators as to the value of any proposition that will protect the integrity of the work done under contract for the Government.

Abundant evidence has been developed in the investigations made from time to time by Congress that the Government has been defrauded on work performed for it by private parties, and I am going to offer an amendment that I think will aid in protecting the Government from being imposed upon in the carrying out of its contracts with private parties for the furnishing of armor plate and other munitions of war. It may possibly be subject to a point of order as general legislation, but I am sure no Senator here will feel it to be his duty to invoke the rule against an amendment that will aid in securing honest work from Navy contractors. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, line 20, after the word "each," it is proposed to insert the following:

Any person who shall first inform of the cause, matter, or thing whereby any fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be recovered from any person, firm, or corporation engaged in a combination or conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States in the construction, or in the quality of any of the materials used, armor or armament of said battleships, or in any war material purchased by the Government of the United States, shall receive from any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated a sum equal to 10 per cent of the amount of such fine, penalty, or forfeiture collected. The informer entitled to receive such payment shall be ascertained by the court which shall have imposed or decreed any such fine, penalty, or forfeiture.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not rise to make a point of order against the amendment. I think the purpose of it is laudable; but I had supposed that the principle of moieties had been pretty well abandoned in this country. I will ask the Senator if that is not a fact?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have drawn this amendment, Mr. President, upon several existing statutes. It is modeled after laws that are now on the statute books.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know that not long ago it was customary in our customs service to grant moieties for discovering smuggling, for instance; but the Government, I think, has entirely abandoned that policy, and I have an impression that of late years the practice has been not to encourage that sort of thing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have simply adapted the statute which is a part of the internal revenue law to this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to hear it stated once more, with special reference to the informer feature. Of course, the amendment is open to objection. It goes out if anybody objects to it. I should like to catch the informer feature a little better.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, at the end of line 20, it is proposed to insert:

Any person who shall first inform of the cause, matter, or thing whereby any fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be recovered from any person, firm, or corporation engaged in a combination or conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States, in the construction, or in the quality of any of the materials used, armor or armament of said battleships, or in any war material purchased by the Government of the United States, shall receive from any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to 10 per cent of the amount of such fine, penalty, or forfeiture collected. The informer entitled to receive such payment shall be ascertained by the court which shall have imposed or decreed any such fine, penalty, or forfeiture.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is that the whole of it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the whole of it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it occurs to me that that would be a very good amendment if the amount should be deducted from the fine or penalty; but the Government might be called on under this amendment to pay the amount whether the penalty was ever recovered or not.

Mr LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is mistaken about that. It provides that it shall be deducted from the amount collected.

Mr. WHITE. I do not think so. I will ask for the reading of that part of the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Shall receive from any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to 10 per cent of the amount of such fine, penalty, or forfeiture collected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator will observe that it uses the word "collected."

Mr. WHITE. I did not catch the word "collected."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. All in favor of the amendment will say "aye."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I make the point of order on the amendment that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the point of order comes too late.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A point of order, in the opinion of the Chair, can never come too late. The Chair will be compelled to sustain it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oklahoma will permit me, some time ago I made a point of order against an amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma. I desire now to withdraw the point of order and have the amendment again submitted.

Mr. GORE. I wish to express my appreciation to the Senator from New Hampshire. I ask that the amendment may be stated from the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 26, line 24, after the semicolon and the numerals "$100,000," it is proposed to insert:

For fuel-oil storage, at some point accessible to the oil fields of Texas and Oklahoma, to be determined by the Secretary of the Navy, $150,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma stipulates that this point shall be accessible to the oil fields. How accessible does he propose to have it to the sea?

Mr. GORE. I will state that the location of the storage tanks or facilities is left discretionary with the Secretary of the Navy. They may be placed at Port Arthur, Tex., or Galveston, Tex., or Aransas Pass, or any of those points, or wherever, in the judgment of the Secretary, they would be most desirable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, line 24, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "purchased"——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand that the rest of the bill is to be stricken out?

Mr. LANE. No; all on that page.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all on that page after the word "purchased" and to insert "except in case of emergency."

Mr. LANE. I think it would be a good idea if we struck out the rest of the bill, but I do not intend to have that done.

Mr. GALLINGER. How would it read if amended?

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the following words:

Unless the powder factory at Indianhead, Md., shall be operated on a basis of not less than its full maximum capacity.

And to insert:

Except in case of emergency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that this amendment is distinctly in contravention of the theory upon which the increase of $500,000 for Indianhead was requested the other day, as suggested by the Secretary of the Navy. It was distinctly stated on this floor that the Secretary did not necessarily intend to use the plant to hammer private manufacturers unjustly; that it was in the interest of the Navy and of the war efficiency of the United States Government that the private factories should be encouraged to exist upon a reasonable basis; and that the addition to the Government plant was largely for the purpose of obtaining a fair price and of increasing the manufacture of powder in this country when an emergency should so demand.

The amendment just submitted is distinctly contrary to the whole theory of the other amendment and the arguments that were laid before the Senate in its favor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not know whether I understand the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, but the argument on the floor the other day, when this matter was under consideration, was that they wished $500,000 to enlarge the powder factory so that they might have the power not to exclude the business of the Government from private enterprises entirely—they were disposed to patronize them—but they wanted this $500,000 addition to the powder plant to use as a club to enforce low prices. I use the word "club" as it was then used. The way this paragraph reads, there can be no club about it until after this factory is worked to its full capacity and more powder is then needed.

We will suppose, for instance, that you are building a factory for a club, and that you propose to allow certain contracts to be let to private parties. Let us see how this reads:

That in expenditures of this appropriation, or any part thereof, for powder, no powder shall at any time be purchased unless the powder factory at Indianhead, Md., shall be operated on a basis of not less than its full maximum capacity.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, this is applicable alone to this appropriation. It can apply only to the appropriation in this bill.

Mr. WARREN. Very true; but this appropriation is for the next 12 months, and we are likely to need to buy powder within those 12 months.

Mr. SWANSON. The $500,000 that is appropriated can not produce an increase in the capacity of the factory under 12 months.

Mr. WARREN. We do not know about that.

Mr. SWANSON. So this provision can not affect the powder that could be made by the increased appropriation of $500,000. It would simply require the factory to be operated to its full capacity now, getting powder at 40 cents instead of paying 53 cents for it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am so much a man of peace that if the Senate wants to tie its hands and the House wants to tie its hands and tie the hands of the Government so that it is impossible to buy any arms, any powder or ball or cannon until such time as you may have an immediate necessity for it and have no reserve and then find no one to buy from, because the foreign countries can not sell it to us because it is contraband, and our private works here that you have discontinued using at all or giving contracts to are turned over to the making of commercial powder exclusively, then I must, of course, be satisfied; but that is the direction in which you are legislating, and I think it a dangerous direction.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether this is a private factory or a Government factory?

Mr. WARREN. This is a Government factory.

Mr. KENYON. I was not clear as to that.

Mr. WARREN. It seems to me the Government, or those who are in command, say, the Secretary of the Navy and certainly the President of the United States, ought to have the privilege, in case of impending trouble, of buying powder beforehand and storing it and having it on hand when necessary. That would be impossible under this amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Not at all. Under the provisions of this bill we can not buy powder except in excess of what we can make ourselves.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. If we need more powder than we can make ourselves, we buy it. This provision is simply to compel the Government to operate the factory at Indianhead to its full capacity, and we can not use this money to buy powder except such as it can not manufacture.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; but the Senator is laboring under the impression that the buying of arms and powder could be calculated beforehand upon the regular consumption of various departments, we will say; whereas, as a matter of fact, we are at all times in some liability of war, and it would seem as if we are to be more so just now and during the coming year than usual; and this provision absolutely forbids any surplus. If it should seem necessary, there can be nothing bought.

Mr. SWANSON. Oh, if the Senator will permit me, this bill provides for the purchase of 4,000,000 pounds of powder, roughly 3,810,000 pounds. Under the present operation of the Indianhead factory about half of it is made by the Government and half of it is purchased from the Du Pont Powder Co. This provision, which has been carried in the bill, requires the Government to run its Indianhead factory to the full capacity, making the 2,000,000 pounds. It makes it at 40 cents a pound, and for the powder we buy we have to pay 53 cents. It saves 13 cents on every pound of powder. Instead of leaving it to the discretion of the people in the department to run it or not to run it, and to pay 13 cents a pound more than is necessary for powder, Congress has seen fit to say that we shall use this money to make all the powder we can there, which at present is 2,000,000 pounds a year. We do not leave it discretionary with anyone to determine whether we shall buy powder at 53 cents when we can make it at 40 cents.

Mr. WARREN. There is no objection to that. The point I make is that under this legislation and what it implies you can only buy powder after you have an immediate necessity for use over and above what this provides for. In other words, you can make no storage, and in war immense quantities are required and on short notice, and great quantities can not be procured on short notice, but must be provided for long beforehand or the battle is lost.

Mr. SWANSON. This provision simply says that if you want to buy some powder to-morrow you can not buy any more than you need, less what the factory at Indianhead can make to-morrow.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like to have the paragraph read as it will read if the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Purchase and manufacture of smokeless powder, $1,150,000: Provided, That no part of any money appropriated by this act shall be expended for the purchase of powder other than small-arms powder at a price in excess of 53 cents a pound: Provided further, That in expenditures of this appropriation, or any part thereof, for powder no powder shall at any time be purchased except in case of emergency.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, it seems to me that would absolutely shut out the department from the purchase of any powder at all until an emergency arose under which it would be required. I think it is a very unwise amendment and that the paragraph had better remain as it came from the House.

Mr. SWANSON. I fully agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon prevails, it will make it impossible for us to buy next year about 2,000,000 pounds of powder until the new factory has been completed. It will make it impossible even to furnish ammunition for the battleships that we commission next year. It seems to me the provision we have at present in the bill is a sufficient protection to the Government.

Mr. WARREN. I think it is more than sufficient.

Mr. SWANSON. It is ample. The difficulty with the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon is that if that prevails, next year, when we commission a battleship and desire to equip it with ammunition, we will not be able to do so, because no emergency will exist.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I think that is arguing on the assumption that everybody connected with the Government has lost his wits. If the Government officials are building a battleship, and have enough intelligence to construct it, they ought to be wise enough to provide powder for it when it is completed. If they have not, then an emergency will exist, and they can go and buy it. That is ample to cover it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the maximum capacity of the factory at Indianhead is 2,000,000 pounds a year. It might run to two millions and a half. We use about four millions; and this amendment would really prohibit the Government from getting enough powder to equip a battleship.

Mr. LANE. It does not limit it in any way. It allows the Government to go on and produce all the powder it can, and compels it to do so, instead of buying it at private sale. That is my test. Then, if an emergency exists, the Government can go and buy powder, but only in case of emergency. It is designed to put the Government factories to work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think we all know that the policy of the present Secretary of the Navy is, as far as possible, to construct what is needed for the Navy in Government yards. I am sure of that.

I wish to say here that in voting a day or two ago against the provision which requires one battleship to be built in our own navy yards I did so solely because I was sure the Secretary of the Navy would build both of them in our navy yards if he could. If I had had any doubt about his doing so, I would have voted to require him to build one of them there. I am not sure that I did not make a mistake in not voting that way, because we might have a Secretary of the Navy later on who would not be disposed to build in our own yards, and I think he ought to do so. I hope we shall build both of our battleships in the near future in our own yards. I think they ought to be built in that way, and I think we ought to make all of our powder that we can.

Mr. LANE. I am willing to concede that the present Secretary of the Navy is an able man, a good man, and also the handsomest Secretary of the Navy we have ever had, but he might die, and I want to fix this law so that in case any accident happened to him we could go on with the work.

Mr. SWANSON. The provision now in the bill directs that the powder factory at Indianhead shall be run to its full capacity. They have there now three shifts of hands, each working eight hours a day all the time, making every ounce of powder they can. If the amendment of the Senator from Oregon prevails, we can not buy 2,000,000 pounds of powder a year out of this appropriation unless an emergency should arise.

Now, how do we determine what is an emergency? An emergency does not mean lack of powder to equip some battleships. It means war, or something of the kind. These battleships are armed as soon as they are commissioned. The ammunition is put in them, and we do not wait until they are engaged in a conflict or something of the kind. This would simply preclude equipping a battleship when it went into commission.

The bill at present provides that we can not buy any powder unless the Government powder factory is run to its full capacity, which means three shifts a day, which are being run now. The effect of it would be simply to cause a delay in commissioning these ships until the completion of the enlarged powder mill at Indianhead, which I favored, and voted to appropriate $500,000 to construct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in former bills there has, as a rule, been an equitable distribution of the appropriations for the several navy yards of the country. I will take but a moment in calling attention to what I think is an inequitable distribution in this bill.

When the bill came from the House there was an appropriation for the Boston yard of $22,000 and a provision to appropriate an unobligated balance of $148,000, making $170,000.

The navy yard at New York was allowed $122,000. This was increased by an amendment to $143,500, with an additional authorization of $85,000.

For the navy yard at Philadelphia, as the bill came from the House, there was $65,000 appropriated, which by an amendment has been increased to $265,000.

The navy yard at Washington, D. C., had no appropriation and by an amendment it is granted $100,000.

The navy yard at Norfolk, Va., had $450,000, which has been increased $200,000, with an added authorization of $2,800,000.

The navy yard at Charleston, S. C., was granted $170,000, which, to my surprise, has not been increased.

The navy yard at Mare Island, Cal., was granted by the House $207,000, which was increased to $257,000, with an added authorization of $50,000.

The navy yard at Puget Sound, Wash., had $155,000 as it came from the House.

The naval station at Key West, Fla., had no appropriation in the bill as it passed the House, but it gets $100,000, with an authorization of $500,000 more.

Mr. President, for some reason or other the navy yard at Portsmouth, N. H., got lost in the consideration of both the Secretary of the Navy and the Committee on Naval Affairs. Turning to page 39, I do find that the amount of $10,000 is given to that yard for repairs and improvement of machinery and implements.

Mr. President, I am not going to find any particular fault with this matter. It is settled. The bill will pass. I shall not obstruct it. But I can not help expressing regret that in a moment of mental aberration and for the purpose of doing a pleasant thing I voluntarily retired from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and as a result I fear that the appropriations for the navy yard in my State have suffered.

I simply desire now to suggest that before another naval appropriation bill appears in the Senate I shall try to cultivate the acquaintance of the Secretary of the Navy and to get on the blind side of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, in the hope that the Portsmouth Navy Yard may not be entirely forgotten in the future.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have one suggestion to make. I am rather pleased to see that in the bill $100,000 and over has been provided for the entertainment of visiting naval officers and forces.

We have tried repeatedly heretofore to obtain some relief in Army bills. We have been modest enough to ask sometimes for only $5,000 or $10,000, so that the military representatives from foreign countries could receive some attention or entertainment when visiting this country, and that we should not have to choose between the two extremities of either utterly ignoring such visitors when every other country in Christendom provides for their receiving attention or else we must exact from the general officers and others who happen to be at the post where they may visit that such officers must raise money enough of their own in some way from their salaries or from loans—and they oftentimes run in debt quite largely to obtain the funds with which to entertain—to do for the visiting brethren what other Governments do and what the United States now proposes to do for its naval visitors.

I hope we may hear from the Secretary of War, if he has not already made some estimate, so that in some bill which follows this there may be an appropriation subject to the Secretary of War the same as this is subject to the Secretary of the Navy to enable us to entertain the few foreign army officials who may come to this country under the orders of foreign Governments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

Mr. THORNTON. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have no personal objection to the motion of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], but I call his attention to the fact that it is unusual, and we ought to send the bill to the other House and have it ask for a conference. Then in the usual course it gives the papers to the Senate, and they can report the results of conference first.

I notice in the debate in the House a few days since a great deal of fault was found with the Senate Committee on Agriculture because we sent the Agricultural appropriation bill over with a request for a conference without giving the House the opportunity of first agreeing or disagreeing, and, if disagreeing, for the House to ask for conference.

My objection to the motion is that it is unusual, and I think it puts the Senate at a disadvantage. The bill with the amendments of the Senate ought to first go to the House, as has been the rule and practice since time immemorial with only very few exceptions, and those of late. Sometimes the House concurs in all the amendments to a bill and then no conference becomes necessary. The House will hardly do it now, perhaps, but we ought not to change the rule and practice.

Mr. THORNTON. My object is to get through with this business as quickly as possible, and therefore I insist on my motion.

The motion was not agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, June 3, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 2, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal and ever living God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee that the way is always open for larger life and greater usefulness for those who will enter in and avail themselves of the opportunities which wait on the faithful. May it be ours to do of Thy good pleasure, following ever in the wake of Him who "increased in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man," till we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ, passing from glory unto glory, and Thine be the praise forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15657 and other bills embraced within the special order, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15657 and other bills embraced within the special rule, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15657 and other bills embraced in the special order of the House. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned on yesterday evening we had finished reading section 18, and it is now open to amendment, as I understand, and I desire to send forward the following amendment, which is a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 18, line 23, on page 36, strike out the period and insert a semicolon and add "nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful."

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman explain this?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir. If you will notice section 18, it says that in labor disputes no injunction shall be issued restraining a person from ceasing to work, commonly known as striking; no injunction shall be issued against a person for advising or persuading others to quit work—that is, to strike; no injunction shall be issued against a person or persons prohibiting them from assembling peacefully together at a place they may select; no injunction may issue against a person forbidding him to cease to patronize a party to the dispute; no injunction shall be issued against a person or persons or labor organizations forbidding them to pay strike benefits or withhold strike benefits.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Would not this also legalize the secondary boycott? I want to call the gentleman's attention to lines 16 and 17, on page 36.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it legalizes a secondary boycott.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Let me read the lines, if the gentleman will permit. And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit anyone—

From ceasing to patronize those who employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do.

Now, does not the word "others" in that instance refer to others than parties to the dispute?

Mr. WEBB. No; because it says in line 15:

From ceasing to patronize or employ any parties to such dispute.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Can the gentleman suggest as to what the word "others" refers to if it does not refer to others and parties to the dispute? Can there be any doubt this is intended or does, in fact, legalize the secondary boycott?

Mr. WEBB. I will say frankly to my friend when this section was drawn it was drawn with the careful purpose not to legalize the secondary boycott, and we do not think it does. There may be a difference of opinion about it, but it is the opinion of the committee that it does not legalize the secondary boycott and is not intended to do so. It does legalize the primary boycott; it does legalize the strike; it does legalize persuading others to strike, to quit work, and the other acts mentioned in section 18, but we did not intend, I will say frankly, to legalize the secondary boycott.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not true, I will ask the gentleman, if these statements, every one of them contained in this paragraph of this section, have been time and time again declared by the supreme courts of the United States not to be illegal or unlawful acts?

Mr. WEBB. Not time and time again by the Supreme Court of the United States, but time and time again by various inferior Federal courts and the Supreme Court.

Mr. TOWNER. By the supreme courts, I said.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, we are frank to say in our opinion everything set forth in section 18 is the law to-day.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. But would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment which would expressly exclude the secondary boycott?

Mr. WEBB. Well, with our present view and understanding of the section we feel it is not necessary to accept such amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. So there can be no doubt as to what it is, and it seems to me that we ought to know just what is intended to write into this law.

Mr. WEBB. The word "others" is confined to the parties to the dispute.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Others than parties to the suit.

Mr. WEBB. It does not say "others than."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Read lines 15, 16, and 17, on page 36. It seems to me the word "others" can refer to nobody else but others outside of the parties to the dispute.

Mr. WEBB. There may not be any others and probably will not be, and if there are others they must be parties to the dispute where the strike takes place.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If the gentleman will accept an amendment, I will offer one.

Mr. WEBB. I will say this section was drawn two years or more ago and was drawn carefully, and those who drew this section drew it with the idea of excluding the secondary boycott. It passed the House, I think, by about 243 to 16, and the question of the secondary boycott was not raised then, because we understood so clearly it did not refer to or authorize the secondary boycott.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important amendment that has been offered, and I think the House ought to thoroughly understand it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman have the amendment read again, so that we can get it clearly in mind?

Mr. HENRY. Yes. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 18, line 23, page 36, strike out the period and insert a comma, and add "nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] will yield, I would like to have about five minutes more, because most of my former five minutes was taken up by yielding to questions.

Mr. HENRY. Very well. I will resume the floor later.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Now, I will say to the gentlemen of the committee, having recognized and legalized the acts set forth in section 18, so far as the conscience side of the court is concerned, the committee feels that no harm can come from making those acts legal on the law side of the court, for anything that is permitted to be done in conscience ought not to be made a crime or forbidden in law.

That is the view we take of it, and that is the reason why we offer this amendment, which provides that the acts and things set forth in section 18 shall not be construed to be unlawful. That is as clear, Mr. Chairman, as I can make it, and I think it covers the section and is easily understood.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I regard this as a very important amendment. Section 18 may be truly regarded as a bill of rights for the labor organizations. This bill was passed through the House before. This section as a separate bill was held up in the Senate. I am glad that we are now about to make it a part of the antitrust program.

Some of us, after reading this section in connection with the other provisions of the general bill, did not believe that it was quite explicit, and that there ought to be some addition to section 18. So, on the evening of May 21 of this year, Mr. KITCHIN, of North Carolina; Mr. TOWNER; Mr. HINEBAUGH, of Illinois; Mr. GRAHAM, of Illinois; Mr. LEWIS, of Maryland; and myself met in the rooms of the Committee on Rules for the purpose of examining this section and certain other sections of the bill, and we came to the conclusion that this amendment which has been offered by Mr. WEBB and accepted by the Committee on the Judiciary should be made a part of the bill.

On that evening we formulated this amendment exactly as it has been tendered, and on Sunday morning submitted it to the American Federation of Labor, because we did not want any misunderstanding about this question. We believed that we ought to make history clear; that there ought not hereafter to be any cloudy or foggy history as there was after the Sherman antitrust law was passed. So in connection with the amendment, which was agreed to as a part of section 7, this amendment was agreed to, and we asked the officers of the American Federation of Labor to submit this amendment to their counsel in order that we might clearly understand it and cooperate with them.

They did so, and they have agreed that this amendment is appropriate and indeed necessary; and we concur with them, and the President and the Committee on the Judiciary has concurred with them, and for a very good reason. Section 18, as originally drawn in connection with the other parts of this bill, should be amended in this respect.

Section 18, in connection with other parts of the bill, only referred to the equity powers of the courts, and we thought that it ought to go further, and that there should be an amendment saying that the things mentioned in section 18, if they were done, should not be illegal, not only as far as the equity courts were concerned but that no court should be able to lay its hands upon the members of the organizations touching the rights guaranteed in section 18.

Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman to say that this has been submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary and approved by it. If so, I would like to know when and under what circumstances?

Mr. HENRY. I presume it was. It was submitted to the subcommittee. I have not been in attendance on the meetings of the committee, but suppose it was submitted to the members of the general committee. But this amendment is satisfactory to the American Federation of Labor; it is satisfactory to the President of the United States; and was and is satisfactory to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and the members thereof with whom I have talked; and it ought to be added at the end of section 18 so as to preserve, protect, and perpetuate the rights that are given to labor organizations in section 18, and not only prohibit courts of equity from violating those rights, but also restrain the courts of law from undoing any of those things that we have guaranteed in this section.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HENRY. I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has stated that conferences with certain Members of the House agreed upon this amendment and submitted it to the officers of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that the officers of the American Federation of Labor submitted practically this amendment to the gentleman and other gentlemen of the House before this conference met at all?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; that is true, substantially.

Mr. MANN. So that this amendment did not originate, as the gentleman would have us believe—I will not say "as the gentleman would have us believe"—but as we might believe from the gentleman's statement as to this little conference, that this amendment originated with the officers of the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. HENRY. I think those gentlemen desired this kind of an amendment. And we did agree on certain language in two amendments.

Mr. MANN. This is the amendment which the American Federation of Labor submitted to the gentleman, is it not?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I read:

Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful—

By the courts of the United States?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; substantially. The amendment was submitted to us, and we agreed that it was correct, and that we must organize to make a fight for it, because the affable gentleman from Illinois had said, when the rule was debated, that he proposed to vote so as to make all the mischief possible for the Democratic Party, and we did not want to be taken unawares. So we were organizing to put this amendment through.

Mr. MANN. But the amendment did not originate with the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY. Oh, well, I have no pride of personal authorship. All I say is that I stand with these men for their amendment, and they ought to be exempted from the provisions of the antitrust laws, and this right ought to be written into all these statutes.

This amendment was submitted, considered, and agreed to in the conference held in the Committee on Rules, and the gentlemen there assembled obligated themselves to support and press it.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I ask for an extension of one minute.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask unanimous consent that it be two minutes. I want to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. As far as the committee are concerned, the first time we ever heard of this amendment was when it was presented to the subcommittee by Mr. DAVID J. LEWIS, of Maryland, a Member of the House.

Mr. HENRY. That is the first time you ever heard of it?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. I am not taking any issue with the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WEBB. Certainly not.

Mr. HENRY. I am not going into any controversy with them; but the fact remains that the Judiciary Committee had drawn their sections, 7 and 18, and they were not satisfactory, and we were trying to get together with the Judiciary Committee and shape up this matter so as to prove our friendship for the labor forces of this country and carry out our platform demands. Now, I have no pride of authorship about anything I may have suggested and do not claim anything, but do say we do not want any vague or doubtful history hereafter, and these things ought to be stated here and written down as they occur. Now I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. AUSTIN. In view of a statement in the editorial columns of a Philadelphia paper this morning that the President of the United States has changed his position on this legislation, I wish to know what the gentleman knows in reference to that statement?

Mr. HENRY. Changed his position when and on what?

Mr. AUSTIN. On this labor proposition.

Mr. HENRY. I do not think the President has ever changed his position. I think the President has always been in favor of complying with the Baltimore platform and giving labor everything to which it is entitled. I do not think he has changed his position. You surprise me.

Mr. WEBB. The President has not changed his position with reference to any of these amendments that have been adopted here.

Mr. AUSTIN. What contemplated provision was it that the President threatened to veto?

Mr. HENRY. I never knew of any threats to veto. I think the gentleman must be mistaken about that. The gentleman has got his information from some wild rumor printed in a newspaper.

Mr. AUSTIN. Printed in the local press here.

Mr. HENRY. Sometimes the local press do not always state things exactly as they occur, because they do not get the correct information. They print what they believe, but sometimes they make mistakes.

Mr. AUSTIN. But the statement was also carried in the Associated Press.

Mr. HENRY. Sometimes the Associated Press is misinformed and has to correct things, and it will have to correct this, because the President is not going to veto this bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I think the amendment just offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] undoubtedly strengthens this section; but there are some things about the section that I should like to discover, and I am going to address myself to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The section has two paragraphs, and the first paragraph, which I am going to read in order to get it into the RECORD, is the paragraph fixing jurisdiction in granting exemptions. It reads as follows:

SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have compared this paragraph with former proposals, and in the Pearre bill and in the Wilson bill as amended——

Mr. MACDONALD. And also in the Bartlett bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Michigan correctly says "also in the Bartlett bill"; but not in the Clayton bill. There was included, before the word "involving," as is now found, in line 23, on page 35, the word "or," which seemed to extend the area of this provision of exemption. The exemption proposed under the terms of this bill is to extend to any case—

Between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment.

Now, the inclusion of the word "or" before the word "involving" would, I think, undoubtedly increase the area of the exemption granted to labor. I will not ask the gentleman to answer me just now, but I will ask him to answer me a little later on, when I have also called his attention to the fact that the second paragraph of the section is tied to the first paragraph by the inclusion of the word "such" before the word "restraining" in line 6, page 36, for the second paragraph begins as follows:

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business or happens to be—

And so forth.

Now, that second paragraph, while granting certain rights, is so tied to the first paragraph that there is a probability, to my mind, that you have narrowed the exemption you intended to offer, because the abuse of the injunctive process occurred, as the gentleman knows, in a majority of cases in connection with strikes; and it seems to me the relation of employer and employee ceases when there is a strike, and strikers are not included here. The strikers are no longer employees, and the exclusion of the word "or," it seems to me, takes out of the purview of the first paragraph of exemptions the right of the striker.

Mr. WEBB. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MURDOCK. I hope the gentleman has followed me. I think the point has merit.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that this argument appears to me to be extremely technical. I can not understand the difference.

Mr. MURDOCK. I know; but that is a general statement. I suppose the gentleman believes that he has done that in this case. In the former bills, in the amended Wilson bill and in the Pearre bill and latterly in the Bartlett bill, the word "or" was inserted before the word "involving," and that seemed to extend the exemption granted to a case of strikers, who are no longer employees. I will ask the gentleman if he believes that strikers having struck are still in the relation of employees to a former employer? They may have been discharged.

Mr. WEBB. Exactly. Then what further does the gentleman want?

Mr. MURDOCK. It does not seem to me the definitions the gentleman has given there in the first paragraph—

In any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment—and so forth, includes the case of a striker. I do not believe you can find it in those classifications.

Mr. WEBB. How would the gentleman include his suggestion?

Mr. MURDOCK. By including the word "or," and making it read:

In any case between an employer and employees, etc., or involving or growing out of a dispute—

And so forth.

Mr. WEBB. We have the word "involving" in the section now.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; but without the word "or" preceding it you do not include strikers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it not sufficient where it says "or growing out of a dispute"?

Mr. MURDOCK. If the word "or" were inserted, it certainly would be, but without the word "or" I do not believe it is. I am going to ask the gentleman if he will accept that amendment?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I could not agree to that. I think the phrase "involving or growing out of" is sufficient. I think that would include a strike, and that is what we intend it to include.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why not be certain about it by including the word "or"?

Mr. WEBB. I think the use of that word might make it uncertain.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to have the gentleman explain to me in what way it would make it uncertain.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to the gentleman that we have gone over this very carefully and drawn the section, having in view the decisions on the matter, and we passed it through this Congress two years ago just as it is written, although the gentleman was not here to vote for it, I believe, by a vote of 243 to 18, and I should feel loath to change the wording of it now.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman take time to explain to me, and I will be obliged to him if he will, how strikers are included in this definition as given at the bottom of page 35 without the inclusion of the word "or," before the word "involving"? I would like to know if an employee who has severed his connection with an employer is still an employee; and if he is, how can you include him in this paragraph?

Mr. WEBB. After he has ceased work he cares nothing more about the relation, provided he can not be compelled to go back to work, and we do not permit that in the bill. He could not be punished for persuading others to do likewise, and how would the word "or" help the situation?

Mr. MURDOCK. But these prohibitions against the use of the injunctive process are confined to the classes of cases set forth in the first paragraph of section 18, and that does not include strikers.

Mr. WEBB. It covers the entire field of strikes, primary boycott, and everything incident to a strike.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for another two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that strikers are employees who are seeking work under different conditions than they were working under when they struck. Strikers are really seeking work, but they are seeking their positions back under conditions which they desire.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not think the gentleman can read that into the proposition.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I do not think that as long as judges are going to construe laws in the narrowest possible way against labor that we will ever get anything right.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is what I am trying to guard against. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he can read into those various definitions of classes of cases where the position of a striker is included, and if the gentleman from Illinois realizes that the second paragraph of section 18 by the use of the word "such" in line 6 may narrow the very privileges that the gentleman is trying to expand?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I would construe or define a striker as one seeking work under different conditions. As long as he is on strike he is certainly desirous of going back to work again on different terms. He is an employee until his place is filled, and as far as my understanding of it goes, while I do not believe we ought to leave any opening at all in regard to this, because our experience is that the judge has always put a narrow construction upon it——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, where does the gentleman from Kansas suggest the insertion of the word "or"?

Mr. MURDOCK. Before the word "involving," in line 23, page 35, and I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that my point was this: I may not have made it plain. The various definitions of classes of cases immediately preceding that line in the bill do not, to my mind, include strikers, and the abuse of the injunctive process which we are seeking here to cure has in the great majority of cases arisen from strikes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Would not the insertion of the word "or" before the word "involving" destroy the symmetrical construction and the real meaning of the sentence, because you must go back in reading this section to the beginning and, skipping over what I shall omit, read it in this way:

That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case involving or growing out of a dispute concerning the terms or conditions of employment.

That is what it means.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, if the gentleman will follow me, what I am attempting to do is to read that paragraph in this way:

SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, or in any case involving or growing out of a dispute—

And so forth.

In other words, we want to add another class of cases to those already in the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I suggest to the gentleman that he has all of that in the language of the section as it now stands, because it reads, beginning at the beginning and proceeding on to line 20—

In any case between an employer and an employee, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment involving or growing out of—

And so forth.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to state that the insertion of the word "or" before "involving" would not improve the section, but, to my mind, would complicate it. "Involving" relates back to "case," and if you insert the word "or" I do not know what it would relate to.

Mr. MURDOCK. I grant that "involving" does refer back to "case," but by the inclusion of the word "or" you would make a new class of cases and include strikers. The gentleman from Arkansas knows that under this paragraph there are several kinds of classes to which are granted exemption; that is, cases between employer and employees, between employers and employees, and between two sets of employees, and between persons employed and persons seeking employment; but none of these classes of cases, to my mind, include strikers. And it was the strike which caused this proposition to be offered.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. There is where I take issue with the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman explain how strikers are included?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will give the gentleman my construction of it.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to hear it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The provision reads:

SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment—

And so forth.

I think in every case of a strike where the purpose of the strike relates to the terms and conditions of employment it is included in the language of the bill. I can not agree with the gentleman from Kansas that when strikers temporarily quit work, demanding better terms and conditions before they resume, that the relation of employer and employee has ceased. It may have ceased temporarily, but this broad language used in the provision would undoubtedly include them.

Mr. MURDOCK. I hope the gentleman is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. GARDNER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, will the gentleman from Kansas listen to me? He wishes to insert the word "or" before the word "involving," and that would make the clause read as follows:

SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted * * * in any case * * * between employees * * * or involving or growing out of a dispute—

And so forth.

In other words, if an employee had a case against another employee, no matter what the cause, whether a labor dispute or anything else, under the gentleman's amendment no restraining order could issue. I believe the gentleman from Kansas is correct when he says that strikers are not employees; but I suggest an amendment which I think may fix it properly. In line 21, after the word "employees," insert the words "or persons seeking employment," so as to read:

That no restraining order shall issue in any case between employer and employees or persons seeking employment.

If the men were on strike, they would be seeking employment. Would not that amendment remove the difficulty?

Mr. MURDOCK. I suppose it would if you define persons seeking employment as referring to strikers. Yes; I think it would.

Mr. GARDNER. The same amendment must also be inserted in line 21, after the word "employees." I think if the gentlemen on the Judiciary Committee will turn their minds to the matter they will see that there is something in the contention of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. I have listened to the discussion with a great deal of interest, and have given some study and thought to the question. I have discussed it also with some Members. I had in mind, when the committee amendment was disposed of, to suggest an amendment which I hope the committee will adopt. I think the gentleman from Kansas has suggested a weakness that ought to be corrected. The amendment I had in mind to propose is, on page 35, line 21, after the word "employee," insert "or persons between whom the relation of employer and employee is temporarily suspended because of a strike or lockout."

As I view it, a man on a strike has not necessarily terminated his employment, but the employment is temporarily suspended. But it might be construed that it was a complete cessation.

Mr. WEBB. He is seeking employment.

Mr. GORMAN. It might be construed differently.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think the gentleman's amendment would include my suggestion.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I want to call attention to the language that strikes me may cover the situation. On page 35, line 23, suppose you were to add the words "or desiring" between the word "seeking" and the word "employment," in line 23. Would not that help the situation?

Mr. MURDOCK. I did not catch the language.

Mr. DICKINSON. In line 23, before the word "employment," insert "or desiring," so it shall read "seeking or desiring employment." I do not think that parties who are not either seeking employment or desiring employment, but who are simply creating trouble without wanting employment, ought to have any protection under this law, but those seeking or desiring employment should be protected.

Mr. MURDOCK. That would introduce a new element, and I am not prepared to say whether I would like it or not.

Mr. DICKINSON. If you put in the word "desiring" or "wanting employment," that would broaden it and cover that class of men who would strike and want employment, but leaves out that class of men who are trying to interfere between the employer and employee and do not want to work at all, and I suggest the addition of the words "or desiring employment."

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas if he would not make that plainer and entirely clear it up, and I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] in connection with the point he raised. Would it not be better to insert, before "involving," the following words: "or in any case," so that the section would then read:

That no restraining order or injunction shall issue in any case between the employer and employees or between employers and employees or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, or in any case involving or growing out of a dispute—

And so forth. Now, the reason for that is this: As I understand this section, the word "involving" modifies the words "in any case."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman can take the floor in his own right.

Mr. DECKER. I will move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the trouble with the section, and the only trouble, is the word "involving" modifies the words "in any case," but being at the end of the paragraph and so far from the words "in any case," it might, at first reading, be thought to modify the word "employment," which it follows, and so I think the amendment should be "or in any case," inserted before the word "involving."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate is exhausted on a similar amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. But I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated that an amendment is already pending to that effect.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment to strike out the last word be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Missouri is the same amendment suggested by the gentleman from Kansas, only in a different form. It has the effect of which I complained in the case of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas. The effect of inserting the language which the gentleman suggests would be that no restraining order could be granted by any court of the United States in any case between employees, whether the dispute referred to a labor difficulty or to some other kind of difficulty.

The result of the gentleman's wording is the same as the result of the wording suggested by the gentleman from Kansas. It would forbid the issuing of a restraining order in any case between employees, no matter what the cause was. The dispute might perhaps refer to the blocking of a water course. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that perhaps the words "or persons seeking employment" would not cover strikers inasmuch as strikers would not necessarily be seeking employment. Not being a lawyer, I feel a good deal of doubt as to my wisdom in making suggestions of this sort, but I suggest, in order to clear up this section and to leave the wording beyond peradventure of a doubt, that the members of the Judiciary Committee ought to insert some words in this section which would embrace strikers engaged in a contest with their employers under the significance of the word "employees."

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS. What is the gentleman's idea of the effect if you simply strike out all in line 20 after the word "case" down to and including the word "employment," in line 23, so that it would read:

That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, I am not at all sure but what that is a solution of the whole question.

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Let me ask the gentleman if this will not take care of the whole thing? By changing the order of this clause what it really means is this:

That in any case involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment between employer and employee—

And so forth.

Now, that covers the case of strikers, because the case originally grows out of a dispute between the employer and employee. I think that is just what it means, but the order of the words should be changed for clearness. It says in any case between employer, and so forth, whereas it means a dispute arising between employer and employee concerning terms or conditions of employment.

Mr. GARDNER. I see the gentleman's point, and it strikes me as being very ingenious. The dispute, of course, must have originated when the strikers were still employees.

Mr. PHELAN. The case where a dispute arises is in the case of a strike. If the word "employee" does not include a striker, it does not mean anything in this case, but it would simply mean there shall not be a restraining order between an employee and the man at present employed.

Now, if you change the order of that wording I believe the whole thing will be taken care of and there will be no misunderstanding.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is right in the idea that when the dispute arose it was between the employer and employees, but it has been suggested by one of the gentlemen near me that many times people are engaged in a strike who never were employees of the employer with whom the dispute arose. At the same time, so long as the whole matter arises out of a dispute between employers and employees, it seems to me that that is where the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is pertinent, and that is what we are trying to arrive at.

Mr. PHELAN. The section does not say you shall not have a restraining order against employees. It says you shall not have a restraining order where a dispute arose between employers and employees, and it does not classify those against whom the order is to be made.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the gentleman's idea is a good one.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentlemen of the committee if we can not come to a limitation of time to the convenience of all. We have spent a good deal of time, and I am afraid we are splitting hairs.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] will speak for 5 minutes and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD] will offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. We want half an hour on this side.

Mr. WEBB. Is not that too long?

Mr. MANN. It may be; but still we want it.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not all on the word "or."

Mr. MURDOCK. No; it is not on the word "or" entirely.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the pending section and amendments thereto close in 50 minutes; 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and 20 minutes by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto close in 50 minutes; 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and 20 minutes by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further discussion——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we were told by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] that this amendment had been submitted to the President, and met his approval. We have not yet been told by the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that this amendment has been submitted to Col. Roosevelt [laughter], although a few days ago the papers all carried the statements, repeated day after day, that the gentleman from Kansas and the members of the Progressive Party were going over to New York to find out what their attitude was on these labor amendments. [Laughter.]

We know that the Democratic side of the House does not know what its attitude is until the matter has been submitted to the President, and we were told that the Progressive Members of the House did not know what their attitude was until they had had a chance to consult Col. Roosevelt. Evidently, when the gentleman from Kansas went over and saw "the colonel" he did not derive very much comfort and did not get the information which he sought on this labor amendment, for yesterday, when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD] offered an amendment to exempt all labor organizations and farmers' organizations from the operation of the antitrust laws, his colleague from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], the other Progressive Member from that State, did not vote with him, and the chairman of the Congressional committee of the Progressive Party, a very distinguished gentleman of this House, for whom I have a high regard, my colleague [Mr. HINEBAUGH], did not vote with the gentleman from Michigan on his amendment. So I take it that when my friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] went to New York and asked "the colonel" what the gentleman from Kansas thought [laughter] on the subject of these labor amendments the colonel was not able to tell the gentleman from Kansas, and hence the Progressive Party yesterday was split up the back. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; even for an explanation. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I know the gentleman from Illinois is a very busy man. I will ask him if he has ever read the Progressive platform on this proposition?

Mr. MANN. Oh, that would not make any difference, whether I had or not.

Mr. MURDOCK. The platform is very specific, and I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois, if he will let me answer all his question, that "the colonel" stands on the Progressive platform, and the Progressive platform is all right.

Mr. MANN. How was it, then, that yesterday, when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD] offered an amendment and voted one way, the other gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], his compatriot Progressive, voted the other way, and that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], the leader of his party on the floor, voted one way and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH], the chairman of the congressional committee of the Progressive Party, voted the other way? [Laughter.] Evidently they did not know how to read the Progressive platform [laughter], or else in that respect, as in many others, no one can tell, after reading it, what it means. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman let me answer that question? He has asked the question why there was a division.

Mr. MANN. I have not asked any question. I have commented upon a fact, though if the gentleman denies the fact I will yield to him.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will answer the gentleman's question by saying that the members of the Progressive Party, unlike those of the Republican Party and the Democratic Party, are not hog tied in this House. They vote their own sentiments. That is the genius of our party.

Mr. MANN. Exactly. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. We leave the individual free.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. But I would make this exception, that the gentleman from Illinois—if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. MANN. I would like to have a little of my own time. The gentleman from Kansas says that the Progressives vote their sentiments. That is true; but they do not know what their sentiments are until after the gentleman from Kansas goes over to New York and asks "the colonel" what the gentleman from Kansas thinks. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, referring again to the matter in controversy, I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact: I think the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] was undoubtedly right in his contention; but I think he is wrong, and others are wrong, in saying that the phrase and others following it "involving or growing out of" refers back to "any case." If that were true, then there would be no necessity for the disjunctive "or."

But I call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that this is a prohibition against any restraining order being granted in cases, first, of a dispute between an employer and employee; second, between employers and employees; third, between employees; fourth, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment.

Now, if you desire another class, you will have to use another disjunctive "or," else the words following it are only qualifying or limiting words to the phrase:

Or between persons employed and persons seeking employment.

There is no question whatever about the grammatical effect of the words—

Involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment.

As it now is, it limits the statement immediately preceding "or between persons employed or persons seeking employment," because the words "or between persons employed and persons seeking employment" are one clause, and you should have following that the words "or in cases involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment" if you wish the section really to mean what you intend it to mean. I call the attention of the committee also to this fact, that however this may be interpreted, you certainly ought not to allow the comma to follow "of" in line 23, page 35. If you leave it there, it will further cloud the meaning of the section and give rise to further controversy that may be disastrous. There is no reason for the insertion of the comma. As it is, it breaks the clause and makes its application uncertain.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to transpose the language so as to give the meaning as I understand it, without changing the wording, except transposing the words:

SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property—

And so forth. That is exactly what it means as it is written; but by transposing the words you get the meaning more clearly.

Mr. TOWNER. I think if the gentleman will transpose those words it might have the effect that he desires, although——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is what it means now. The word "involving" modifies the word "case" and nothing else.

Mr. TOWNER. No; the gentleman is mistaken about that. You can not take a lot of instances which are marked off from one another by the word "or" and then have these words "involving or growing out of a dispute" follow one of those disjunctive instances, without limiting its application to that disjunctive instance That is very clear. It will serve the purpose the gentleman desires if he places it where he has just read it, because then it would not follow or modify or limit one of those clauses.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The purpose was to make the phrase "involving or growing out of a dispute" modify the word "case." We understand that is what it means now, and we are perfectly willing to transpose the words as indicated.

Mr. TOWNER. It might serve the purpose intended by transposition, but certainly it does not do so now.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The committee is convinced that that is what it means.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, at the end of the amendment offered by Mr. WEBB, add the words "but nothing in this act shall be construed to permit a secondary boycott."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to this language, so that members of this committee may know just what they are voting for. I will read it, omitting matters not pertinent, so as to call to the attention of the committee the point I have in mind. The second paragraph of this section reads:

No injunction shall prohibit any person from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do.

That is the plain reading of the provision. In the light of decisions that we have had on the subject of a secondary boycott, can it be questioned that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will legalize the secondary boycott? I want this House to know just what is proposed, so there can be no dispute in the future as to the attitude that we are assuming. While I have always strongly sympathized with labor, may not friends of labor hesitate? With this amendment we shall erase from the statute books practically every Federal law that can reach organized labor or any kind of labor. Is that what we desire? If it is, let us be frank enough to say so. There are two sides to this proposition.

If there is to be no law to protect property or the man who seeks to labor, if the courts are to be deprived of their power to protect property and personal rights, the only thing left is civil war. How long do you suppose the public is going to submit to such a program. A strike does not only injure the parties engaged in it. The community in which it occurs suffers severely. I recall very vividly the effect of the coal strike that occurred some ten or twelve years ago. The suffering which the country endured was very great. Should another strike of that kind occur, in what condition would we be in the absence of any law to protect persons or property and in the absence of the restraining influence of the courts? Would not public indignation write upon the statute books far more drastic laws than anything now complained of. It is true that State laws will apply to and condemn many acts, but such laws can not protect the free flow of interstate commerce, and without such commerce the country must suffer severely. Those who refuse to protect the people now may not then find it easy to explain their course.

Do we want to place ourselves in the attitude of exempting any class of our citizens from the operation of the law that applies to other citizens? It seems to me that this is the real question that is before this House, and one that you can not avoid or dodge. It seems to me that we ought to face it as it is, and not pretend that this section means something different from its plain reading. I have asked you to write an amendment into this act so as to make it plain that it means what you say it means. I do not believe the President will sign this bill with a provision in it which legalizes the secondary boycott. I do not believe any such law can be constitutional. A person not a party to the dispute may be absolutely ruined by such a boycott. Is he to have no remedy under the laws of this land?

Mr. MAHER. Will the gentleman state what his opinion is of a secondary boycott?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I can not go into that; it has been discussed in the courts, and it has always been condemned. I do not know that there ever was a decision in its favor.

Mr. MAHER. Some people do not know just what it means. I would like to have the gentleman's idea of a secondary boycott.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. A secondary boycott affects and injures a party not concerned in the dispute.

Mr. MAHER. In case of a dispute between railroad employees on a trolley road and their employers, where an employer locks them out, as it were, issues an order that on and after a certain day they will not be employed on account of their connection with a labor organization, and the merchant on the outside doing business down town takes the part of the employer and patronizes the employer, is he not taking the part of a secondary boycott?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I am not going into a discussion of the different phases of a secondary boycott. The question of what is a secondary boycott is pretty well understood.

Mr. MAHER. It is from one side.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have not the time to go into it more fully.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman has been dealing with the secondary boycott in which property rights may be invaded, and where the injured party may not be concerned in the dispute between capital and labor. Will the gentleman explain what is meant by this language, on page 36, line 10:

And no such restraining order or injunction—

And so forth—

shall prohibit any person or persons from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be—

And so forth.

Does that mean any person or persons, organized or unorganized, may assemble in or at the house of a workingman?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; and in as large numbers as they choose.

Mr. MOORE. And interfere with his peace and right of employment. Is not that an invasion of personal liberty, to say nothing of the invasion of the rights of property? Does not this tend to restrict the liberty and labor of the person owning or occupying that house?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think it does. Mr. Chairman, I ask the other side to consume some of its time.

Mr. MOORE. I understood the gentleman to say that it does restrict personal liberty?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; it may. The fear inspired by large numbers may and often is as effective as the actual force, though no actual force is used.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I should vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota if I were not perfectly satisfied that it is taken care of in this section. The language the gentleman reads does not authorize the secondary boycott, and he could not torture it into any such meaning. While it does authorize persons to cease to patronize the party to the dispute and to recommend to others to cease to patronize that same party to the dispute, that is not a secondary boycott, and you can not possibly make it mean a secondary boycott. Therefore this section does not authorize the secondary boycott.

I say again—and I speak for, I believe, practically every member of the Judiciary Committee—that if this section did legalize the secondary boycott there would not be a man vote for it. It is not the purpose of the committee to authorize it, and I do not think any person in this House wants to do it. We confine the boycotting to the parties to the dispute, allowing parties to cease to patronize that party and to ask others to cease to patronize the party to the dispute.

Mr. MOORE. I call the gentleman's attention to line 10, page 36, where one of the privileges against which restraining orders may not issue is "attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be." Does not that mean an invasion of the constitutional right of the citizen, and that men, organized or unorganized, embittered against one of their number or prejudiced in the extreme, may sit on the doorstep in your house and discuss with your wife while she is preparing the evening meal your right to work?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, my friend does not mean to put that language in, because it is ridiculous.

Mr. MOORE. That is what it seems to say.

Mr. WEBB. I will not say ridiculous, but it is an absurd conclusion to draw from this language.

Mr. MOORE. You gentlemen, as lawyers, know that you have to take the text, and you propose to put this language into law. Now, I will not say the Federation of Labor, because I believe that to be a law-abiding body, but the Industrial Workers of the World. Under this paragraph they may go to your house or attend "at or near your house"——

Mr. WEBB. It does not say that they may go into a man's castle.

Mr. MOORE. You may have a little garden around your house, and they can go into that garden, and that is "at" your house.

Mr. WEBB. It does not say that you can go onto the premises that you are forbidden to enter. That is a man's castle and sacred all over the world where the Anglo-Saxon tongue is spoken. We do not authorize anything like taking charge of a man's home. A man can do these things to-day, if he does it in a peaceful way.

Mr. MOORE. We have recently heard of "gun men" going to a man's premises, revolvers in their pockets, "peacefully" to persuade a man not to go to work until some understanding has been had with him; and that in cities, where the people are packed together, not out in the country. I do not lay this to legitimate labor unions.

Mr. WEBB. What did the gentleman's city authorities do under those circumstances?

Mr. MOORE. Oh, the police authorities, if they can reach such men, do it.

Mr. WEBB. Do what?

Mr. MOORE. Seize the gun men.

Mr. WEBB. They can do the same thing under this act.

Mr. MOORE. I question whether they could in certain interstate relations.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. My friend refuses to read the further portion of this same sentence.

Mr. MOORE. I know this pertains to a Federal injunction.

Mr. WEBB. It says for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from work. The idea of peacefully assembling runs all the way through this entire section, and unless it is done peacefully it is in violation of the law.

Mr. MOORE. I understand the peaceful part of it thoroughly; but suppose we take the instance of Tarrytown, N. Y., and substitute a workman who is earning two or three dollars a day for John D. Rockefeller, jr. I presume he would be entitled to some protection. I presume the cause of the trouble did not originate in Tarrytown, N. Y., but out in Colorado.

Mr. WEBB. And does the gentleman want to deny to the laboring man——

Mr. MOORE. And I presume in that case your Federal injunction——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further, unless the gentleman will permit me to ask him a question or to answer one of his.

Mr. MOORE. This is a very important question, and the gentleman has limited the time for debate.

Mr. WEBB. Would the gentleman deny to a laborer or to any other person in the United States the right to peacefully assemble and discuss his grievance?

Mr. MOORE. I certainly would not.

Mr. WEBB. Then the gentleman should vote for this section.

Mr. MOORE. But I would vote to sustain the humblest individual in his right to have his home protected.

Mr. WEBB. This section does that, because it does not include the criminal law of the land.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman can not have had very much experience with "peaceful persuasion."

Mr. WEBB. Whether it be a laboring man or a lawyer or a merchant or a banker who violates the law, the law will consider him.

Mr. MOORE. And when you permit the Industrial Workers of the World, who have a pretty broad field—and it is said that they also operate in Europe, where we can not reach them—to camp on the gentleman's doorstep in North Carolina, or on that of some laboring man who may not agree with them, it might be that he would like to have some court to go to when he found he was unable to protect himself. He ought to have some place to go.

Mr. WEBB. I want to tell the gentleman that we have courts to go to to protect ourselves under those circumstances, and if the gentleman has not in Pennsylvania, I invite him to come down to North Carolina.

Mr. MOORE. I am going to say something about the industrial conditions in the gentleman's State in a day or two, but I am referring now to the Industrial Workers of the World and others who may or may not respect the law.

Mr. WEBB. Does the gentleman mean the "I won't work" people?

Mr. MOORE. I believe the gentleman to be the friend of labor, as I believe all of us want to be, but I think most men in a great House like this, a deliberative assembly of the people's representatives, ought to be fair to all labor. We ought to deal with all of the workers of the land without specializing a few. It is a question whether under the badge of organization we are bound to pass laws here covering 30,000,000 wage earners in this country, most of whom are unorganized and not represented here at all. I question whether the hundred millions of people of this country do not look to this Congress to deal fairly with every man who has a right to protection under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, while I like to hear my friend talk——

Mr. MOORE. Oh, I know, and thank the gentleman, but I have gotten in a little of something that ought to be said.

Mr. WEBB. After that beautiful piece of eloquence, I will ask the gentleman if he did not vote for the amendment which I offered yesterday?

Mr. MOORE. Which amendment?

Mr. WEBB. The amendment providing for the exemption of labor organizations and farmers' organizations.

Mr. MOORE. I was not here yesterday when that vote was taken. There are certain legal phases of that question which are open to dispute, but if I believed his amendment was in favor of a legal classification of labor against other classes of labor, I would have voted against it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman completed that colloquy. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] indicates that he might have done differently from the other 207 of us.

Mr. MOORE. I think the 207 ran away like a flock of sheep yesterday. They were terrorized, too much terrorized to do the business of this country for a hundred million people, rather than for the few gentlemen who seem to hold this House in the hollow of their hands.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman, then, would have voted against this proposition?

Mr. MOORE. I think I would have voted against almost anything the gentleman from Kansas brought in, because he does not know legislation or the rights of the people.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor. How much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD].

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, just a word in regard to what the gentleman from Illinois had to say, facetiously, I presume, as to the position of the Progressive Party upon the amendment yesterday. In view of the fact of the condition of the Republican Party upon this trust legislation, as is shown by the varying minority reports that are filed by the Republican members of the Judiciary Committee, it seems to me that it ill becomes the gentleman from Illinois to comment upon any diversity of opinion upon any branch of this subject.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment that has been suggested here by a number of gentlemen, involving the use of the word "or" in line 23, unmistakably makes a new class of cases that will be included if the word "or" or language substantially accomplishing the same purpose is inserted. And I want to call attention again to the fact that has been mentioned by my colleague from Kansas, and that is that this becomes doubly important in view of the use of the word "such" in line 6 of the next paragraph, because by the use of the word "such" in line 6, the next paragraph——

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. I just want to finish this. The equity power conferred in this part of the law is limited absolutely to four classes laid down in paragraph 1, and if you leave out the word "or," or its equivalent, you limit these cases to four classes only, and you leave out cases where strikes exist; but if you put the word "or," or its equivalent, in you make it five classes and include these cases.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. What other case can the gentleman imagine could be included in this? Any case involved or growing out of a suit concerning terms or condition of employment. Does not that cover the whole range of strikes, employment, wages, hours of labor, and so forth?

Mr. MACDONALD It says in any case growing out of a dispute between persons employed and persons seeking employment. Now, it has been argued, and I think it is true, that a person on strike or after he has struck or has been discharged is not a person seeking employment.

Mr. WEBB. He is seeking employment—that is why he strikes.

Mr. MACDONALD. But the language says, "or between persons employed and persons seeking employment," and the previous language is "in any case between an employer and employees or between employers and employees or between employees." Now, the use of the disjunctive makes a new class named herein, and clearly includes all involved in disputes of the character described in the language that follows.

Mr. WEBB. That is where the gentleman and I differ. It covers every case involving or covering every phase of employment.

Mr. MACDONALD. I desire to offer, and I shall offer, an amendment, page 35, line 23, after the word "employment," to insert the following: "In the case where a strike or lockout exists or is threatened, or in any other case"; and also, when we reach it, I wish to offer an amendment to strike out the word "such," in line 6, page 36.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan will be reported for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 23, after the word "employment," insert the following: "In the case where a strike or lockout exists or is threatened, or in any other case."

The Clerk reported a second amendment of Mr. MACDONALD, as follows:

Page 36, line 6, strike out the word "such."

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, the facetiæ of the gentleman from Illinois indicates that the Democratic Party has all its inspirations from the gentleman at the White House. It seems to me he seems to indicate, in his opinion, that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] trails after Col. Roosevelt, and he gets his inspiration there and he spreads that among the members of the Progressive Party. Well, if this were true, it must be conceded that the Democrats have a good man to go to [applause on the Democratic side], and the Progressives have a good man to go to, but where in the world do the Republicans themselves have to go? [Laughter and applause.] It seems to me they have to go to the classic shades of Yale to get inspiration from a dead one. [Laughter and applause.] He charges the Progressives have no consistency, and for heaven sake if there ever was any inconsistency is not it demonstrated in the Republican ranks on this side, where a great many of them have been elected as Progressives, indorsing that platform and agreeing to stand by that platform, and coming down here and going in with the same old gang.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And a good many Progressives have been elected as Republicans who did not stand by that party.

Mr. MURDOCK. This is Exhibit A.

Mr. HULINGS. This is Exhibit A and that is Exhibit B. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, aside from jesting, and I want you to understand there is a whole lot of truth in that jest, but aside from that, referring to the thing right in point, it seems to me that all of this controversy can be set aside by striking out, in line 20, after the word "case" on page 35, down to and including the word "employment" in line 23, so that the language will read:

That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, etc., in any case involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment—

And so forth.

Now, without any question, there may be cases in which injunctions will be applied for as against or involving persons who are not employees, because when a labor organization orders a strike and men cease to work and march out they are in no sense employees. They may be joined by men who never were the employees of the party seeking the injunction, who are the very ones doing the things complained of. But the suggestion I make here would leave out all difficulty of that kind. You would include every person in any case involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment. I wish to bring that to the attention of the committee, and especially the gentleman from North Carolina, because I believe it will commend itself to him as a reasonable, rational, and very clear exposition of what is intended in this section. I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to send this amendment to the desk and ask to have it read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HULINGS:
Page 35, line 20, after the word "case," strike out all down to and including the word "employment," in line 23.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I hope some one will send for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. Can not the gentleman yield to me later when he gets back?

Mr. HULINGS. I suggest the gentleman from Kansas go after him.

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I will let him come back.

Mr. WEBB. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to use any more of his time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Not at this moment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, just one word. It is quite evident that Members of the House have a wide difference of opinion as to this particular section, and I want to say the committee has worked over it again and again and again, we have gone over it for two years, and that this particular language in this particular section has been indorsed probably by every labor union in the United States. It is an excerpt from what is known as the Bacon-Bartlett bill, and it covers in a proper way, we think, every possible angle of the strike situation. We think any sensible man will agree that a striker is a person who seeks employment, otherwise he would not strike, and those are the ones we ought to take care of, at least the labor organizations of America think so, and I trust that the committee will leave the section as it is. If you begin changing the section I do not know where it will land us.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. What would you think, then, of the application of the section in a case of this kind. You are an employer of labor; your men cease work; I am in sympathy with them; I never was in your employment, and I do not seek any employment, but I go in and make common cause with them against you, and you take me into court. What would you do in that case?

Mr. WEBB. You would have no business hanging around there. You would have no business "butting in," if you are not a party in the dispute. That is labor's own cause, and if the employer and the employee grip on the proposition, we will take care of that.

Mr. HULINGS. In a section later you justify me in going in and making common cause against them.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In the case mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania this writ of injunction would not apply at all. This injunction would go against other people?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly. We want to confine the language to the parties to the dispute, and no others.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman says that he thinks the language "persons seeking employment" covers persons on strike?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir. That is the opinion of the committee.

Mr. GARDNER. But section 18 does not mention disputes between "employers and persons seeking employment."

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes. I think that is covered.

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, no. The wording relates to cases "between persons employed and persons seeking employment."

Mr. WEBB. I think that is covered.

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, no. A dispute between "persons employed and persons seeking employment" is a very different proposition from a dispute between employers and people seeking employment. There might be something in the gentleman's contention if the clause referred to cases "between employers and persons seeking employment." I call the gentleman's attention to line 22, which refers to cases "between persons employed and persons seeking employment." I think that that clause refers to disputes between persons known as "scabs" and the usual force of employees in any establishment.

Mr. WEBB. I do not know what you mean by "scabs," but it says "between persons employed and persons seeking employment."

Mr. GARDNER. It is all qualified by what goes before it. What is your objection to extending the definition of the word "employees" by a proviso at the end of the section. I suggest something like this: "The term 'employees' in this section shall be held to include persons whose status as employees has been suspended by a strike or lockout." What is your objection to that?

Mr. WEBB. You might weaken the section by doing it. Now I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] this morning took occasion to drive up to my front door and leave a bouquet. [Laughter.] I want to make acknowledgment of the fact.

Mr. MOORE. There were some thorns among the roses. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will permit me to go on, I will yield to him later. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes a general charge of cowardice against the membership of Congress. When asked the simple question how he would have voted yesterday had he been here, he followed the characteristic Republican attitude, and dodged. How would the gentleman from Pennsylvania have voted in the House yesterday? Will the gentleman answer the question and stop dodging?

Mr. MOORE. If I had thought that a vote "aye" would have meant to specialize a certain class of the 30,000,000 of workers in this country, I would not have voted "aye," nor would I have played the game of buncombe which has been played since this agitation began.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania typifies the political situation that prevails in the country. "Truth is mighty and will prevail." There is talk in New York and in Washington, with the aid of the press, in San Francisco and St. Louis, of amalgamation between the Progressive Party and the Republican Party. Do you think there is any chance of amalgamation between a set of men who want to go forward and a set of men, typified by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who evade, dodge, and sidestep on everything? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] also demonstrates this morning, I think, the situation of the country, and proves that there is no prospect of harmony between the Progressive and Republican Parties. The gentleman from Illinois typifies by his charge against me—facetious enough in its way—precisely what has been the matter with him in the last six or seven years with respect to the political situation. He did not consult Col. Roosevelt enough. By having consulted Col. Roosevelt a little more he and his party would be—well, somewhere else than on the road to destruction and decay, as it is. [Laughter.] Col. Roosevelt can not be justly accused of dodging or evading any public question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like just two minutes more.

Mr. WEBB. I will give the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MURDOCK. The three parties are shown precisely as they stand before the Nation in the attitude of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and that of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] and the Progressives on this floor. For a matter of four or five years, to my knowledge, under the leadership of Mr. Taft, backed up by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the reactionaries here and at the other end of this building absolutely locked away in committee every bit of remedial legislation that labor wanted. Every man within the sound of my voice knows that that is true.

In those days every time we succeeded in getting an amendment in favor of the exemption of organized labor we had to do it by revolution, over the protest and veto of the Republican leader in this country, Mr. Taft, and I think sometimes over a rather serious protest from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], although I am not certain about that.

The Democrats came into power with a plain pledge in their platform to exempt labor, after a record of amendments in the House and Senate which gave in terms exemption. And what did the Democrats do? Why, they have followed their usual plan of action and have brought into the House for the indorsement of the Members an amendment that is ambiguous. If you put the Progressives in power, Mr. Chairman, we will not dodge as the Republicans have dodged, we will not be ambiguous as the Democrats have been ambiguous; we will bring in an exemption clause that will mean business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I have not dodged any issue, and I have not waited for a nod from the galleries to determine how I shall vote, as the gentleman from Kansas has persistently done throughout this debate.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. No; I will not. I have not even changed the RECORD, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has done this morning. After pleasing our labor friends in the galleries by frequent glances up that way, and by smiles and nods, and after referring to the National Association of Manufacturers, possibly forgetting that the late Progressive candidate for governor in Massachusetts, Mr. Bird, was not only a Progressive but a leading member of the Manufacturers' Association which he denounced, and for which denunciation he received applause, the gentleman from Kansas changed the RECORD this morning so that instead of calling that association the "corrupt" National Association of Manufacturers he has, with Col. Bird, the Progressive, in mind, changed it to the "powerful" National Association of Manufacturers. I do not have to correct the RECORD in that way, because I am not constantly watching what Mr. Gompers and Mr. Morrison and that able band of labor leaders up there in the gallery are doing or thinking as to my vote. I should feel myself despicable indeed if I stood here as a representative of the people and voted to exempt Mr. Samuel Gompers or Mr. Frank Morrison or others up there in the gallery from the operation of the criminal laws of this country and made a special class of them or any hundred of them. I would not exempt John D. Rockefeller from the operation of the criminal laws of this country, nor would I exempt Andrew Carnegie from the operation of those laws; but before and within the law I would hold each man responsible for his own acts, the man who employed and the man who was employed alike. I would not make fish of one and fowl of the other. And if it be a crime in the presence of the labor representatives who have been in the galleries dictating this legislation for the last 10 days to make this declaration in favor of the rights of the workingmen of this country regardless of union or nonunion, then I stand convicted before them; but before the people and before my conscience I am grateful for the opportunity to say that I would not vote for special legislation exempting crime nor for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, who is playing politics and has been playing to the galleries from one end of this debate to the other.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], who was elected as a Republican——

Mr. CAMPBELL. And he could not have been elected if he had not been.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Like a number of other gentlemen in the House who were elected as Republicans—some of whom now have the courage to call themselves Progressives and abuse the Republican Party all the time, although they never were elected upon any ticket except the Republican ticket—will have the opportunity next November of running as Progressives. There has been talk of amalgamation, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] says, but the so-called Progressives throughout the country, the men who voted for Col. Roosevelt the last time, are coming back to the Republican Party. It is not an amalgamation, and whatever the outcome may be, the gentleman from Kansas will be left out in the cold. He was elected as a Republican. He repudiated the party which he followed until he had been elected, and when the Progressives come back to the Republican Party, as the voters will, these little so-called leaders in the House, who can not think for themselves, who have no position upon any question until they have asked the colonel, and now can not find out from the colonel—they can still continue to be Progressives, but enough of the people will come back into the Republican fold until this House will be Republican the next time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. May we not have the amendment reported again? After this desultory debate we have lost sight of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WEBB:
At the end of section 18, line 23, on page 36, strike out the period and insert a semicolon and add.
"Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful."
Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD:
Page 36, at the end of the amendment offered by Mr. WEBB, add:
"But nothing in this act shall be construed to permit a secondary boycott."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEBB. A division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is too late.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the Chair did not state that the ayes seemed to have it, and therefore the gentleman from North Carolina was in time, because the Chair announced that the ayes had it and hardly gave the gentleman from North Carolina an opportunity for division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair only heard one vote in the negative, and for that reason announced the result. The Chair is of the opinion that the request for division comes too late unless some gentleman was on his feet.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman from North Carolina was on his feet as quickly as possible asking for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the request comes too late. The Clerk will report the amendments in the order in which they were offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MACDONALD:
Page 35, line 23, after the word "employment," insert the following: "In a case where a strike or lockout exists, or is threatened, or in any other case."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MACDONALD) there were 15 ayes and 80 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second amendment by Mr. MACDONALD:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULINGS:
Page 35, line 20, after the word "case," strike out all down to and including the word "employment," in line 23.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk as a new section.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. If an amendment is offered as a new section, will that deprive a Member of the right to offer an amendment to section 18?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the committee has disposed of section 18. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment as a new section, but the Chair is unable to determine its application until the amendment is read.

Mr. BARTLETT. But we have not passed section 18. The gentleman from Illinois has an amendment to section 18, and he is entitled to offer it now.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, we had passed section 18 and the Chairman had instructed the Clerk to read, and I offered my amendment as an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so stated to the committee.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to interfere with the gentleman from Indiana at all, except that I do not want to pass section 18 without the right of offering a very slight amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be obliged to hold that the gentleman must have unanimous consent to return to section 18.

Mr. FOWLER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to section 18.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Illinois arose and offered to submit a preferential amendment to section 18. We had not passed section 18, except to close debate, and the gentleman from Indiana proposed to offer an amendment as a new section. My colleague could not tell whether the gentleman from Indiana proposed to offer a new section or to amend section 18 until the gentleman from Indiana stated his purpose. When he did my colleague said that he desired to offer an amendment to section 18. Certainly that was in order as a preferential motion, not debatable, of course, because debate has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. In any event the Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. On page 35, line 20, I move to insert after the word "case" a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 20, after the word "case" insert a comma.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have but one word to say.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, debate is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the committee the gentleman from Illinois can not be recognized to discuss his motion. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOWLER) there were—ayes 3, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 36, by adding a new section to be known as section 18a:
"The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under this act shall be concurrent with that of the courts of the several States, and no case arising under this act and brought in any State court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to a court of the United States."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that amendment, to its germaneness and to its insertion in this place in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, let us have the point of order disposed of. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is called for.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER. Has the point of order been made?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly on the point of order. The regular order has been called for. The Chair understood the gentleman from North Carolina to make the point of order.

Mr. WEBB. I make the point of order.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, this being an independent section, it can be introduced at any place in the bill. It is not dependent on any other section; it is not an attempt to amend any other section or to qualify other than extend the process of the courts or the jurisdiction of cases to be tried under the provisions of the act, so that it is not material whether it be introduced after section 18, after section 14 or 15, or any other section. It might come at the end of the bill, and would be applicable there, so that not being an amendment to any particular section of the bill it is germane in any place in the bill at which it may be introduced, because it is a new section and a section that gives jurisdiction to State courts as well as the Federal courts in actions arising under the provisions of this act.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. This amendment does not simply confine the right to sue in the State courts to the matter of granting injunctions, but it is general in its jurisdiction. Is that true?

Mr. CULLOP. That is true.

Mr. BARTLETT. In other words, that any proceeding under this bill to enforce the law provided for in the bill can be brought in a State court as well as in the Federal court?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. In other words, it confers concurrent jurisdiction on the State courts with the Federal courts to enforce any part of this bill, either civil or criminal?

Mr. CULLOP. That is the object of it; but, of course, it would apply to civil cases. Mr. Chairman, if it was simply applying to any particular section of the bill in reference to the bringing of suits and the trying of cases, then its germaneness might be attacked, as it is now, because it should be made a part of the section to which it would be applicable under the circumstances; but being applicable to every provision of the bill, giving jurisdiction to State courts to try any violation defined under any provision of the bill, it is germane at any point in the bill, as an independent section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the merits of the proposition. This amendment is offered for the purpose of bringing convenience to the people who may have litigation under any provision in this act which we are now considering. The language of this section is precisely the same as that enacted by Congress in 1910 in the employers' liability act, which reads:

> The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under this act shall be concurrent with that of the courts of the several States, and no case arising under this act and brought in any State court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any court of the United States.

The language of this amendment is taken directly from the language of the amendment which was offered to the employers' liability act of 1910. Let me call the attention of the committee to this situation. Some of these Federal judicial districts are very large. Many people reside a long distance from the place where the courts are held. A gentleman from California the other day said that some of the people there were living 400 and 500 miles from the place where the courts were held. In such circumstances where there were violations of this act the suits could be brought in the State courts, tried and determined at home, and it would be a matter of convenience as well as economy to the litigants who might have to resort to the courts for redress of grievances under the act.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Where does the gentleman find authority in the Constitution of the United States giving this Congress the right to confer any jurisdiction, civil or criminal, on a State court?

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, that is too well settled to take up any time in the discussion of it here.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman give me an authority for it?

Mr. CULLOP. Why, we have an act of Congress to which I have referred; that is the best of authority for it. Why not? This Congress has conferred jurisdiction of this character on the State courts. It is simply giving a cause of action under a statute, and Congress has a right to confer jurisdiction in the State courts.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. SINNOTT. For the benefit of the gentleman from Ohio who asked the question, I will state that that matter has been decided in the Two hundred and twenty-third United States.

Mr. GORDON. In a criminal case?

Mr. SINNOTT. No.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman think we would have authority to confer jurisdiction in a criminal case?

Mr. SINNOTT. This is conferring jurisdiction in a civil case.

Mr. GORDON. And in a criminal case, also.

Mr. CULLOP. We are conferring the jurisdiction here in a civil case.

Mr. SINNOTT. I think it should be confined to a civil case.

Mr. CULLOP. The same is true under the national banking act. The benefit of this would be that people who have to resort to the courts for a redress of grievances under this statute would have the convenience of being able to do so in their own home courts, which would be an economy, and the matter could be tried and determined just as well as in any Federal court; and I hope the amendment will be adopted for that reason.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment. This legislation is supplementary to the Sherman Act. Jurisdiction under the Sherman Act is confined to the Federal courts, and I think properly so. There are a number of reasons why this proposed amendment of the gentleman from Indiana should not be incorporated into this bill. In the first place, it would be a burden to the State courts to have jurisdiction over these cases conferred upon them. This Federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction of this class and character of legislation and should retain full jurisdiction in the trial of such cases. Dissolution suits are under the control of the Attorney General of the United States. We have district courts throughout the country, with district attorneys employed by the United States to look after the Federal business, and I think that the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana to confer jurisdiction over these cases upon the State courts would be an injustice to the people of the States and to the courts of the States; and I oppose it for that reason. In the second place, this is a very broad and far-reaching statute in its provisions.

It deals with the business interests of people of all classes—railroads, manufacturers, industrial concerns, combinations, and conspiracies in restraint of trade—and we think it would likewise be an injustice to parties litigant to take them away from the jurisdiction of the Federal courts and confer jurisdiction upon State courts to try this character of cases. It broadens the scope of the law. It is one of those things which if attached to this legislation will make it all the more difficult to pass the legislation, and we do an injustice to the cause and principle which we seek to establish by this legislation if we broaden the measure with far-reaching and momentous questions such as the gentleman from Indiana offers as an amendment. Any friend of this legislation, as I am sure the gentleman from Indiana is, ought not to aid those who are fighting this legislation—the trusts and the combines of this country—by loading it down with questionable amendments that will tend to defeat it and destroy it in the end. For these reasons the committee opposes the amendment and hopes that it will be rejected.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this question is exhausted.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the doctrine just advocated by the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] is a very dangerous doctrine, indeed. In its last analysis it means to many a denial of justice, and a failure to enforce the law in all its phases. Who are the parties that have been always running to the Federal courts? Has it been the individual or has it been the trusts and the big corporations? The answer is easy and is within the knowledge of all. It is the experience, I am confident, of every man on this floor that the men who seek cover under the ample folds of the Federal courts of this country are the owners of the trusts and big corporations of the country, and by so doing they are constantly forcing the poor man out of the benefits of such legislation as this by seeking that forum for the adjudication of their cases. Aye, gentlemen, if it is desired to protect the trusts, to protect the big corporations of this country, under this act, then confine its jurisdiction to the Federal courts and it will well nigh destroy the advantages of the legislation we are attempting to adopt here to-day for the relief of the people. Who is it that has been running to the Federal courts for the last quarter of a century? Who is it that has taken refuge in the Federal courts of this country? Has it been the poor individual or has it been the trusts and the big corporations which seek to be relieved from penalties and from punishment provided for in the law of the land? Go read the petitions for removals from the State to the Federal courts of this country, and it will be found that in every instance they are filed by the corporations or rich and powerful individuals for the purpose of escaping the penalties of the law. It has been their refuge for escape from deserved punishment. Cases are removed frequently for the purpose of getting away from the scene where the injury has been inflicted and where the poor man will be unable to follow it up, take his witnesses to court, and conduct his litigation as it ought to be conducted. Why impose hardships on litigants? And yet the gentleman from Arkansas says that a measure that seeks to bring these cases at home and let the poor man try his case in the court where he resides, where the injury was inflicted, and where the witnesses reside, that such a measure is in the interest of the trusts and of the big corporations of this country. The gentleman will not stand by that declaration for a moment, because it is not only ridiculous, but it is contradicted by the facts, as the experience of every individual will verify. The reverse is true, and every man knows or ought to know it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I did not make the statement attributed to me by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CULLOP. Then I misunderstood the gentleman from Arkansas, and I am glad to know he did not desire to be so understood.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The statement I made was this: That if we load this measure down with amendments of far-reaching import like this, it would tend to defeat the legislation, and that would result in the interests of the trusts.

Mr. CULLOP. I beg to disagree with the gentleman. How does this load it down? Are not the judges of the State courts as capable, as learned, as honest, and conscientious as the judges of the Federal courts to try and determine the questions involved in this legislation? Upon what meat does the Federal judge feed that makes him so much greater than a judge of a State court? [Applause.] Who are these judges of the Federal courts? They are the men who have been taken off the benches of the State courts from the bars over the country. What has made them more able to construe a statute than a State judge? Where and how is this measure loaded down with any such amendments? What complication does this amendment involve? I defy the gentleman or any other gentleman to point out how any harm may come from the adoption of this amendment. It simply gives the right of trial in the locality where the cause of action arises and at home where the witnesses are. It gives opportunity for a full and fair hearing of a cause. It assures economy in the administration of justice. It assures a speedy trial in a competent tribunal. Does anybody have objection to this? If so, let him state it. Can anyone who desires fair play in our courts take exceptions to it? If so, I would be pleased to have him do it. We are now legislating on a subject of much interest to the American people. Relief has been promised them from the extortions of remorseless organizations, in which greed and avarice have been the dominating features in their operations. They have stifled competition, bankrupted their weak and unfortunate competitors, and out of the ruins of the unfortunate created monopoly, through which the people have been unmercifully plundered. Let us furnish the best and easiest method for a redress of grievances, in order that the people may take advantage of its provisions and secure relief. With that end in view I offered this amendment, and no one will here deny but what it will afford great benefit in the administration of this law.

The people expect us to afford them a complete remedy and a convenient method for its administration. Their eyes are upon us; they are patiently scanning every move made, because they know how they have suffered for the want of appropriate and adequate legislation on this subject, how often it has been promised, and how often they have been deceived in this matter. They must not be deceived now, but we must afford them a full and complete means of relief and a convenient and economic method for the enforcement of the same. This amendment means much for the success of this legislation, and the poor man, the man who needs this legislation most, will hail its adoption with satisfaction and delight. The committee in charge of this bill and this House should be interested in its success. If it will assist in destroying monopoly, in dissolving combinations operating as a restraint in trade, in restoring competition, it will be hailed with delight by millions of people all over our country and will redound to the glory of all who helped enact it. The amendment under consideration will assist in carrying out the good purposes it proposes and will make it available to many who otherwise could never invoke its provisions or take advantage of the protection it affords. I hope it will be adopted, so that its provisions may become available to the poor as well as the rich, to the weak as well as the strong. [Applause.]

Every line and every word will be closely scrutinized by thousands of patriotic people who have suffered for the want of such legislation and who hope to secure relief through its provisions. They are watching every move made here, every vote cast, in order to know how each man stands, whether friendly to them or friendly to the special interests which have thrived at their expense. They have been promised means for relief; they demand every obligation contained in that promise be scrupulously kept and the fullest measure of relief afforded within the power of this lawmaking body. We will comply fully with the obligation if we adopt this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma). The time of the gentleman has expired. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana as a new paragraph to the section.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced he was in doubt.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 30.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. CULLOP and Mr. WEBB) reported that there were—ayes 32, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. That whenever it shall be made to appear to any district court or judge thereof, or to any judge therein sitting, by the return of a proper officer on lawful process, or upon the affidavit of some credible person, or by information filed by any district attorney, that there is reasonable ground to believe that any person has been guilty of such contempt, the court or judge thereof, or any judge therein sitting, may issue a rule requiring the said person so charged to show cause upon a day certain why he should not be punished therefor, which rule, together with a copy of the affidavit or information, shall be served upon the person charged with sufficient promptness to enable him to prepare for and make return to the order at the time fixed therein. If upon or by such return, in the judgment of the court, the alleged contempt be not sufficiently purged, a trial shall be directed at a time and place fixed by the court: Provided, however, That if the accused, being a natural person, fail or refuse to make return to the rule to show cause, an attachment may issue against his person to compel an answer, and in case of his continued failure or refusal, or if for any reason it be impracticable to dispose of the matter on the return day, he may be required to give reasonable bail for his attendance at the trial and his submission to the final judgment of the court. Where the accused person is a body corporate, an attachment for the sequestration of its property may be issued upon like refusal or failure to answer.

In all cases within the purview of this act such trial may be by the court, or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury: in which latter event the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance, or the court or the judge thereof in chambers may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be selected and summoned, as provided by law, to attend at the time and place of trial, at which time a jury shall be selected and impaneled as upon a trial for misdemeanor; and such trial shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or upon information.

If the accused be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly, prescribing the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court. Such fine shall be paid to the United States or to the complainant or other party injured by the act constituting the contempt, or may, where more than one is so damaged, be divided or apportioned among them as the court may direct, but in no case shall the fine to be paid to the United States exceed, in case the accused is a natural person, the sum of $1,000, nor shall such imprisonment exceed the term of six months.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, unless the gentleman from North Carolina has an amendment to offer.

Mr. WEBB. No; I have no amendment to offer.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, this provision in this bill and subsequent provisions of it, especially that provision that requires that a party charged with indirect contempt of court must be accused, tried, or convicted of contempt by a jury as in criminal cases, is a step in the direction of proper trials in court in such cases. We boast, Mr. Chairman, those of us who live under the English system of laws, that the system of jury trials as handed down to us from English jurisprudence is the greatest palladium of the liberties of the English-speaking people, yet in a case which involves imprisonment and fine, forfeitures and punishment by both imprisonment and fine, we have been struggling in Congress for 20 years or more in order to have enacted into a statute of the United States the right of the American citizen to be tried by a jury of his peers in this class of cases when his liberty and property are at stake. We are about to realize a successful completion of the efforts of the men who have struggled long and patiently to obtain that end. The first bill I had the honor to introduce as a Member of Congress, when I became a Member of it in 1895, was a bill to permit and require, when demanded by a man who might be charged with indirect contempt of the court, that the trial should be by jury.

I have at each succeeding Congress introduced a bill to that effect. It was never considered favorably by a Republican committee or House, but a bill of like character was favorably reported at the last Congress and passed by this House.

The Senate of the United States in 1896, at the instance of Senator Hill, of New York, did pass a bill, introduced by him, providing for jury trials in indirect contempt cases. It came to this House, and went to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, where it slept the death that knew no waking. The Democratic platform in 1896 embodied a demand for the passage of that bill, and from 1896 down to 1912, again and again, it has been reiterated in every Democratic national platform that trials of indirect contempt cases in the courts shall be by jury when that demand is made by the accused.

Mr. Chairman, this bill gives to the American citizen, charged with the violation of an order or an injunction of the court in these cases that we know to be indirect contempts, the right that he ought to have had from the foundation of the Government—the right to have his case, when he is charged with a criminal offense or a quasi-criminal offense, tried by a jury of his peers. This bill further contains a provision giving a right which has not heretofore been enjoyed by those who undergo these trials, namely, the right of appeal. We know the history of these trials, and——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has no more time.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent?

Mr. BARTLETT. I asked unanimous consent, and I addressed myself to the Chair.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MANN. Make it 10 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want only 5 minutes. We who have investigated the matter and have kept pace with it know the history of these cases. It is shocking to my sense of justice; it has always been a matter that offended my sense of what the right of American citizens was, that when charged with crime the judge should be grand jury, prosecutor, and jury to find a verdict and then as judge to pronounce a sentence. Therefore, during all these years, at least since I have been a Member of this House—which on the 4th day of March next will be 20 years—the struggle has gone on, and during those years I have devoted whatever energy and ability I possess to the accomplishment of what this bill accomplishes; that is, to have the right of trial by jury enjoyed by the accused in these contempt cases.

I have been in a United States court, Mr. Chairman, and seen cases of constructive or indirect contempt tried by the judge when those cases were instigated, inaugurated, prosecuted, heard, and tried and judgment rendered and sentence pronounced by the judge who instigated and had the prosecutions started, and when the men thus accused, thus tried, thus convicted, and thus punished, undertook to find relief from what those who had investigated the case or heard it thought and believed to be an outrage upon the rights of a citizen, an illegal and unjust punishment, by appeal to a higher court, they would find that it was embodied as a principle in our jurisprudence that no appeal lay from any such judgment in any such case.

And so, when the American people had wakened up to the idea that there were cases where men could be criminally punished, could be criminally accused, could be tried and convicted as in a criminal case, could be imprisoned and placed in jail and within prison walls, and have their money and property taken from them and be incarcerated in prison; that there was not the right accorded to them which every American citizen and every man who lives under the Anglo-Saxon system of jurisprudence ought to have; when they realized this fact the campaign proceeded and has gone on and on, and the doctrine which was asserted, that the courts have in themselves the inherent power to punish for contempt, and that no one should decide that question except the judge, has been dissipated. These sections in this bill, and those that permit—or require, rather—criminal information and the facts to be set out in the trial of a man accused before a jury, give him a right that he never had before to appeal that case to a higher court and have it considered on its merits.

These are the things which the Democratic Party's platform has demanded, and these are the things which the Democratic Congress intends by this bill to place upon the statute books. It breaks the chains that bound the people to the unjust and tyrannous decisions of unjust judges. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, at least to my conception of law, justice, and right, this section, which gives a trial by jury in contempt cases, is writing into the statute laws of this land enlightened thought. It shows the spirit of the age—that we are moving away from the old archaic idea that all wisdom and all justice is within the cranium and heart of one man, that of a judge appointed for a term lasting until he is dead.

Gentlemen, that has been one of the prerogatives that the courts of this country have possessed since the Constitution was first adopted. It has been more abused than any other right that the courts have had, and I am proud to have the opportunity to vote for a bill that takes that right away from the courts. Not that the judge himself is not honest, but some judges get so far removed from the people that they can not feel for the man who is down in life. [Applause.]

I know from personal experience something of contempt cases, where a Federal court issued a sweeping injunction in a strike that covered every man in the community that was indirectly or remotely involved; and, regardless of what he did, he was amenable to that court under contempt proceedings, and no jury could he have.

I believe that this bill will give the people of the country more confidence in the courts. It will give them more respect for the courts, and it will give the courts to understand that the people have rights, and that those rights can be passed upon by their peers.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. QUIN. I do.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it not the gentleman's opinion that one of the great causes of attacks upon the courts of this country is the fact that they have had imposed on them, or have assumed, the duty of trying persons without a jury for the violation of restraining orders issued in labor cases?

Mr. QUIN. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct. However, I believe myself that some of the courts of the country have brought themselves into the contempt of the people because of that right being frequently abused by autocratic judges.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman ought not to understand——

Mr. QUIN. The American people ought to love the courts, but instead of doing that the usurped and assumed power by the courts has made them, in a measure, the object of contempt.

Mr. GARDNER. I hope the gentleman will not imbibe from my remarks the idea that I am blaming the courts. I am blaming the law or the practice which imposes on the courts the duty of trying without a jury those cases of contempt of court in the matter of labor injunctions. I do not blame the courts, however, for doing what they believed to be their duty. Fortunately it will no longer be their duty after this law shall have been passed.

Mr. QUIN. The gentleman is correct. But the long following of that rule leads the judge to entertain the idea that he is all-powerful, and sometimes he gets to be a tyrant. That is what the people of America complain of.

If the judge knew he would be on the bench only for a few years, and that his reappointment depended on his method of trying cases, it is very likely that he would always try to be in harmony with the people and the law. A judge can make mistakes as well as any other person.

And the judicial tyranny of this country is to-day written through the decisions. If you will read those decisions, you can see tyranny there that is equaled nowhere on earth except by the Czar of Russia or, perhaps, the ruling of some military court; and there is not a man in the United States who could ever have any respect for the ruling of a court-martial. I say that the courts of this country have had a power that they ought not to have had under the constitution of a republic. Some of them have used it properly, but others have used it improperly. It has been a method of oppression, a tool with which to oppress the people. [Applause.]

It has been too easy for the great and powerful corporations to be either directly or indirectly instrumental in naming the Federal judges of this country. In many instances the judge has spent his life as the retained attorney of the special interests, and it matters not how honest he may be, he sees the law from a different viewpoint as distinguished from the ordinary citizen. The great corporate interests believe in the Federal courts, and the sweeping injunction is the weapon which they can always use in an unfair and unjust manner.

Every intelligent citizen knows that many judges have abused the right to adjudge a citizen to be in contempt of the court, and the same judge try and sentence him. In late years the freedom of the press has been abridged by some autocratic judges.

The United States is a Government of the people, and the original framers of our Constitution never intended that the courts should usurp any authority or infringe upon the liberties of the people. The privilege of a Federal judge to deny the right of trial by juries in contempt cases has grown to be one of the greatest abuses in our scheme of government. I do not believe any judge ought to hold his position for life, as there is too much danger of him growing to be an autocrat and intolerant of the views and the rights of others. This section in the antitrust bill which allows the persons charged with contempt to be tried by a jury is one good step in the right direction. Yet there is nothing in the bill to prevent the judge from charging the jury orally and from his seat of power tell the jury that he thinks the individual accused is guilty. He may not do it in so many words, but he will give the jury to understand that he thinks the fellow ought to be convicted. Gentlemen, that is the next evil Congress will be called on to correct. These Federal judges ought not to hold office over a certain term of years. The Constitution should be amended making the term of office of Federal judges for a period of four years, and if any judge holds longer it would be necessary for him to be reselected. I regard life tenure in any functionary position of the Government as indefensible. What good reason can there be assigned for making any man a judge on the bench for life? I am happy to vote to force the courts to grant the jury in contempt cases, and I will be still happier in voting to bar life appointments of judges. The people of this country can never rule in reality as long as the judges hold for life. The laws we are passing this week constitute a real bill of rights, a veritable Magna Charta in which the American citizenship can see hope for the future.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, line 4, after the word "months," add the following:

"In all trials for contempt in such cases the judge whose order has been disobeyed shall not be eligible to sit as presiding judge where any defendant files a motion for change of judge on the ground that he believes such judge to be prejudiced or that a fair and impartial trial can not be had before such judge."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I think that amendment ought to receive the careful consideration of this House and be adopted. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] just suggested that the burden imposed upon the courts in these matters is one of the reasons for the lack of confidence on the part of the people in the courts in a great many cases.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman suggest the origin of this duty of the court; how it came about that the courts have such authority?

Mr. BRYAN. The courts have held that in contempt cases they have inherent rights to try and punish. State judges have held that their rights are superior to the legislatures of the several States, and that their right to fine for contempt does not depend upon legislative enactment; and especially was that illustrated in the Idaho case, where an editor, whose name, I think, was Broxon, published a criticism by Theodore Roosevelt on the action of the court out there in shutting out Progressive electors, and the judges of that court said they were proceeding by inherent right and not under authority conferred by the legislature. But that is aside from the question.

Mr. BARTLETT. How does the gentleman's amendment remedy that defect?

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] led me off on that line. He probably did not intend to; but my amendment proposes that where a defendant is brought before a judge for violating an order of that judge, the judge who has issued the order is not to try the case if the defendant requests a change of judge. There is no reason why a judge who has been angered by the violation of one of his orders should sit and try the case. That has been spoken of here by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. That is sought to be remedied in this act by calling a jury of 12 men; but the judge who rules on the admission of testimony and who charges the jury and interprets the law can many times force a conviction from the jury, and it is not a fair and impartial tribunal where a man is haled before the court to be tried on a summons issued by direction of the court for violating an order that the judge of that court himself has issued. If you want to make this fair, if you want to make it so that a defendant before the court will have a chance of a fair trial, give him an opportunity to be freed from standing before the judge who has ordered him arrested.

The legislatures of a number of the States have provided that in any case where a man comes before the court and files his application for a change of judge and enters an affidavit stating that he believes the judge sitting on the bench is prejudiced against him and that he can not have a fair trial before that judge, then the judge sitting in that court must call in another judge to try that case. There are many Federal judges in this country, and these judges have their prejudices. I do not believe that a defendant ought to be compelled to go to trial before a judge under those conditions. It is true that you can not make this absolute. You can not get perfection. It may be that the second judge will feel the same way, and this amendment only provides for one change, one substitution; but there is at least a better chance at obtaining an impartial judge. It is very easy for the judge to call some one else to try the case. The same statute is on the books of the State of Washington. The same statute is on the books of the State of Ohio. There is nothing new or wrong or abhorrent about it. There is no reason why it ought not to be adopted, especially in a contempt case.

THE CASE AGAINST GOMPERS, MORRISON, AND MITCHELL.

The decision of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in American Federation of Labor v. Buck Stove & Range Co. (33 App. Cases, D. C., 83) is one that attracted tremendous attention. As an outcome of a violation of the "inherent right" of the court to punish for contempt, the head of the American Federation of Labor till a few days ago stood condemned to serve a term in a Federal prison. I shall not attempt to discuss this case except to cite it as one of unusual significance. Mr. J. W. Van Cleave was the principal owner of the Buck Stove & Range Co., of St. Louis. He was also the president of the National Manufacturers' Association, with its manipulations as a corruptionist and insidious lobbyist, with its Mulhall and its millions. The Buck Stove & Range Co. employed union and nonunion men. Thirty-five union men in one branch of the company's service got into a dispute with their employer over matters pertaining to hours of work. The difficulty was not satisfactorily adjusted and a strike ensued. The American Federation of Labor indorsed the action of the men, ordered a boycott of the products of the company, and placed its name upon the federation's "We don't patronize" list. The company applied to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for an injunction to restrain such boycott. On December 18, 1907, the court granted an injunction, pendente lite, restraining the defendants as prayed for in the bill.

The injunction granted pendente lite in this case was in violation of the Constitution, and the appellate court so decided. It was an absurd autocratic order that trampled upon individual freedom, the freedom of the press, and was entirely unjustified. This is established by the majority opinion of the appellate court, by which the absurd injunction was materially modified, but, in my judgment, the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Shepherd should have been the conclusion of the majority. The injunction both as originally granted and as modified by the majority opinion of the court prohibited the publication of the "We don't patronize" list in the American Federationist, the journal of the labor organizations.

The people of this country are not going to permanently stand for such power as permits a life-tenure judge to order an editor in advance of a trial on an ex parte hearing not to publish this or to publish that. Surely if the judge can say what the editor can not publish, by the same token he can tell him what he must publish. The term "freedom of the press" becomes a silly and meaningless phrase under such conditions. The learned judge in his dissenting opinion cited Chancellor Kent, as follows:

It has become a constitutional principle in this country that every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right, and that no law can rightfully be passed to restrain or abridge the freedom of speech or the press.

Chief Justice Shepherd continues:

The true ground for the denial of jurisdiction to restrain the publication of a libel destructive of property is that the exercise of such jurisdiction would amount to an abridgement of the freedom of the press by establishing a censorship over the press so enjoined. The soundness of this view is demonstrated in an able opinion by Fenner, J., speaking for the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in such a case. (State, ex rel. Liversey, v. Civil District Judge, 34 La. Ann., 741, 745.) He says: "There would be no safe course except to take the opinion of the judge beforehand or to abstain entirely from alluding to the plaintiff. What more complete censorship could be established? Under the operation of such a law, with a subservient or corrupt judiciary, the press might be completely muzzled and its just influence upon public opinion entirely paralyzed. Such powers do not exist in courts, and they have been constantly disclaimed by the highest tribunals of England and America. It has passed into a settled rule of jurisprudence that 'courts of equity will not lend their aid to enjoin the publication of libels or works of a libelous nature, even though the libelous publication is calculated to injure the credit, business, or character of the person against whom it is directed.'"

In view, then, of the provision of the first amendment, I can come to no other conclusion than that the only remedy for libelous or otherwise malicious, wrongful, and injurious publications is by civil action for damages and criminal prosecution. There is no power to restrain the publication.

For the reasons given I can not agree to the terms of the decree as modified. In my opinion it should be modified so as to restrain the acts, only, by which other persons have been or may be coerced into ceasing from business relations with the Buck's Stove & Range Co., but so as not to restrain the publication of the name of that company in the "we don't patronize" columns of the American Federationist, no matter what the object of such publication may be suspected or believed to be.

Chief Justice Shepherd believes the attempt to enjoin Gompers, Morrison, and Mitchell from publishing this list in the American Federationist and from talking about the Van Cleave outfit as unfair was an infringement of the Constitution of the United States, and that Gompers, Morrison, and Mitchell had the right to print and talk about the matter and that no court could take that right from them. Is it surprising that Gompers, Morrison, and Mitchell believed the same thing?

THE COURT'S ORDER MUST BE OBEYED, THOUGH UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

The labor leaders at once appealed from the order to the higher court. They put up their bond on appeal, just like the Mulhall employers had put up their bond on obtaining the order. Notwithstanding the appeal, the order remained of full force till reversed. The fact that the appellate court would modify the order and deliver an opinion that it was an outrage on the Constitution could not abate in the slightest its "inherent"—from God descended—power. "What if it does violate the Constitution, this court's order must be obeyed." This is the uniform position taken by all courts as to their injunctions. It does not lie in the mouth of any puny man or labor leader to question a court's order—if it violates the Constitution, reverse it if you can by the regular, tedious, and expensive course of the law's delays, and by the order of a brother judge, but in the meantime, obey is the word.

It is worthy of note that obedience does not need be granted to a statute of Congress which violates the Constitution. Not for a moment. If Congress violates the Constitution in the enactment of a statute, no attention need be paid to it. Such a statute is void ab initio. Anyone is at liberty to violate it with impunity; the quicker it is violated and wiped off the statute books the better for all concerned. If Congress were to enact into law the principles of the iniquitous injunction issued for Mulhall's overlords by the court, prohibiting certain publications and ordering people not to talk about the Mulhall crowd being unfair, no newspaper publisher would for a moment attempt to obey the statute. They would fall back on the Constitution and their rights, as they have done hundreds of times, and then the court would say, as it has said hundreds of times: "You did right; you did not need to obey Congress; the law was unconstitutional." And by its later doctrine the court has found that an "unreasonable" statute is absolutely void and need not be obeyed.

Not only are unconstitutional legislative orders void and entirely unworthy of notice or obedience, although solemnly passed by the House and the Senate and duly signed by the President, but Executive orders, presidential proclamations, treaties with foreign countries, and all forms of Executive demands are void and not worth the paper on which they are written if not in accord with the Constitution. All such may be held in contempt or may be totally ignored.

AN EX PARTE INJUNCTION IS PRIVILEGED ABOVE A STATUTE.

Not so when a judge at the behest of the Mulhall crowd orders men at the head of a great movement for the bettering of labor conditions to suspend exercising their constitutional rights. What if the order does violate the Constitution, it is the voice of the court. It is not the puny legislative or executive department that now speaks; it is the department of the judiciary, which rules like the Kings of England once ruled—by "inherent" right.

Gompers, Morrison, and Mitchell knew this, and they did their very best to obey the order. They took the Mulhall concern off the unfair list and tried to edit their paper to the liking of the court. While the order was on appeal, however, these three men were, on motion of an attorney who was a fellow employee of Mulhall, brought before court and ordered to pay heavy fines and to go to Federal prison, there to do hard labor for 12, 9, and 6 months, respectively, for "contempt" alleged to have been committed in the violation of the injunction. No trial by jury; of course not! Jury trials are designed for the other branches of the Government—the legislative and executive. This is the judiciary enforcing its decree. It makes no difference that the order was made ex parte, before trial, and is yet to be set aside by the United States Supreme Court. In this case the court is acting under powers superior to statute and the Constitution. It is acting under "inherent" rights derived from God Himself under procedure set in motion by Mulhall's associate, as an humble agent in the hands of God to work out His immutable decrees!

FACTS INVOLVING CONTEMPT VERY INDEFINITE.

Gompers had written and published editorials, had appealed for funds, and had advised the members of the federation as to their duty and their rights, and had made references to this suit and to labor's constitutional rights in campaign speeches. Morrison was in contempt because he had allowed old copies of the American Federationist to be circulated that had this "We don't patronize" list in them. They had obeyed the order and allowed the judge to edit their magazine to the extent of eliminating the "We don't patronize" list from all editions after the order was signed. Malefactor Morrison had also sent out printed copies of the printed official proceedings of a prior convention of the American Federation of Labor which contained a record of officers and committee reports of the convention relative to this very controversy. He had also sent out copies of the Federationist. Mitchell had violated the order of the judge against talking or printing by presiding at a convention of the United Mine Workers of America where a resolution was introduced calling upon the members of the union not to patronize this outfit of lobbyists and stove makers.

There is nothing in the record of this case to show that this National Manufacturers' Association was, through one of its representatives, just about this time attempting to bribe Gompers to throw down his work for organized labor and pass into a life of ease, in which case, of course, the case would have been dismissed and the contempt of court duly purged, so far as the court and the complaining lobbyists are concerned.

Of course, it is now well known that this contempt case has been settled by the order of the Supreme Court dismissing it.

I have in mind other contempt cases not involving labor difficulties where the same rule should prevail. The Idaho case which I have already referred to, where C. O. Broxon, editor of the Boise Capital News, offended the feelings of some judges that ought to have been impeached by criticizing their decision by which Roosevelt electors were denied the right to have their names published on the official ballot. These judges ordered Broxon and R. S. Sheridan and A. R. Curzen imprisoned; and they actually served their term of 10 days because of the publication of the Roosevelt criticism. It was an outrage against the spirit of our institutions that these judges could do this without a verdict of guilty from a jury to precede the sentence. Yet the judges said they were acting by inherent authority, and that the legislature had no right either to limit or regulate their authority in contempt matters.

Then, take the case of Col. Nelson, of the Kansas City Star. I do not remember all the details of that attempted judicial outrage, but it stands out to-day as an illustration of the absolute necessity of ordering the courts of this country to give up their self-assumed rights to imprison editors and others where they feel aggrieved. Except for the resourcefulness of Col. Nelson and the order of an appellate court he would have gone to jail.

In my own experience I was the editor and proprietor of a weekly paper published at Bremerton, Wash. I still own the paper, though it is now published in the adjoining town of Charleston, Wash. I was in a fight with a corporation-owned judge in that county, and I used to go to court to try my cases with an appeal bond in my pocket already signed in blank, so that I would be ready to perfect an appeal quick and save temporary incarceration for some unavoidable display of the contempt I felt for that judge.

I had urgent need of that bond, too, one day, and later I needed more than a contempt-of-court bond. But I will say that that particular judge is not in the State of Washington now; he is not away on a visit, either.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the committee will have to oppose this amendment, not because it is not meritorious, but because it is already provided for in the statutes of the United States.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh!

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes; it is. The gentleman says "Oh," but I will read it to him. Section 23 of the Judicial Code says:

Whenever a party to any action or proceeding, civil or criminal, shall make and file an affidavit that the judge before whom the action or proceeding is to be tried or heard has a personal bias or prejudice either against him or in favor of any opposite party to the suit, such judge shall proceed no further therein, but another judge shall be designated in the manner prescribed in the section last preceding, or chosen in the manner prescribed in section 23, to hear such matter. Every such affidavit shall state the facts and the reasons for the belief that such bias or prejudice exists.

That is all my friend asks.

Mr. BRYAN. Does it not leave it discretionary with the court?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. BARTLETT. And the circuit court of appeals for the fifth circuit have decided that it is not discretionary; that the judge has to get off the case.

Mr. BRYAN. I thought it left it discretionary with the judge.

Mr. WEBB. I think it is already covered by the statute. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. BRYAN. Then I will withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. When I interrupted the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] I was trying, very imperfectly, owing to my lack of legal training, to explain a thought which I have had for a long time, to wit, that the attack on the courts of the United States, so strikingly prominent in recent years, arose substantially from two causes: First, our Constitutions, State and National, impose on our courts the duty of passing on the constitutionality of legislative acts. That is an unpopular function for our courts to perform, but I believe it to be a function which our courts ought to perform. Second, upon our judges has been imposed, either by judicial decision in times past or by statute, the duty of trying without a jury persons charged with the violation of injunctions issued in connection with labor disputes.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. May I ask my colleague whether there is any alternative to this position? Is it not a fact that there is not any statute imposing these duties except such statutes as may be declaratory of the common law? The difficulty in this regard is because of the crystallized abuse in which, in the first instance, the judges usurped this matter of issuing injunctions in labor cases.

Mr. GARDNER. The first instance, I have been told, occurred in Massachusetts.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. The first instance arose in England.

Mr. GARDNER. The fact is, I think, that some one or other made up his mind that a jury would not convict strikers. Yet a trial by jury under the terms of the Constitution is guaranteed to every man accused of crime. Some court somewhere—and I was under the impression that it was in my own State—devised the ingenious plan of converting a crime into a contempt of court by the simple process of ordering persons to refrain from acts which the statute had already declared to be crimes. Hence a practice arose under which a judge would step in and say, "Not only does the State declare in the law that this act which you are perhaps going to commit is a crime, but, what is more to the point, I, the judge, also say that it is a crime." Now, what was the object of that performance? Why, sometimes, doubtless, it was this: If the person enjoined went ahead and committed the forbidden act, the question of the court's dignity became involved and the accused got punished, not for a crime but for contempt of court. I have very little patience with any device to deprive a striker or anyone else of his constitutional right to a jury trial by the issuance of an injunction designed to convert a crime into a contempt of court. For this and other reasons I give my approval to the anti-injunction and trial-by-jury features of this bill.

Great Britain has been going through pretty much the same sort of evolution which we are going through. Yet during this period of change and attack on old institutions the courts of Great Britain have not been assailed. The reason, in my opinion, is that the British courts have not been faced with the necessity of declaring laws to be unconstitutional, nor has the writ of injunction in Great Britain been used in such a way as to negative the right of jury trial which ought to be assured to every man accused of wrongdoing.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pro forma amendment. Mr. Chairman, the section of the statute that the gentleman from North Carolina read is a new section put into the statutes since I had the matter under consideration in the State of Washington, when I introduced the same measure in the senate of that State. A number of lawyers and the attorney general declared that it was the most outrageous and ridiculous proposition they ever heard of. It was the hardest effort of my legislative life to keep the governor from vetoing the statute at the request and advice of the attorney general. I am glad to see that the same principle has been put into the Federal statutes. It is right, and the lawyers and litigants, as well as the judges, of the State of Washington know now that it is right, and it would be impossible to repeal it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do not propose to discuss the matter under consideration in the House, largely for physical reasons. I notice with great regret that it seems to be a very popular thing in this body to denounce the courts. During this debate I think I have heard no one on this floor say a word sustaining the integrity of the courts, but I have heard considerable denunciation.

Courts do not always decide cases the way I would like to have them decide them, or at least they did not when I was an active practitioner at the bar. I do not always agree with the decisions of the courts in their construction of legislative acts, nor do I agree with gentlemen on this floor when they say that the courts have lost the confidence of the people. I think the courts have the confidence of the people to a far greater degree than has this House. As far as I am concerned, I have faith in the integrity of the courts as courts, in the integrity of the judges who fill those positions in the courts, and I believe that when the time comes, if it ever does come, which God forbid, that the people really believe, as certain gentlemen have stated on the floor of this House to-day that they do believe that the courts have lost the confidence of the people of this country, that what we will receive is first anarchy and then absolutism. I do not think that time will ever come. I think the courts and the judges of the courts can probably afford to smile good-naturedly at the wild and foolish denunciations which are leveled at them, go ahead, following their duty as best they can, and that in the end they will find that the people sustain them and sustain the doctrine that the last resort in this country in a case of controversy is to judicial determination. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. That the evidence taken upon the trial of any person so accused may be preserved by bill of exceptions, and any judgment of conviction may be reviewed upon writ of error in all respects as now provided by law in criminal cases, and may be affirmed, reversed, or modified, as justice may require. Upon the granting of such writ of error, execution of judgment shall be stayed, and the accused, if thereby sentenced to imprisonment, shall be admitted to bail in such reasonable sum as may be required by the court or by any justice or any judge of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Columbia," in section 21, line 15, strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following: "Provided, That the procedure for writ of error or appeal as in this act provided shall not be construed by any court to supersede the writ of habeas corpus, but the right of such writ shall never be denied to liberate any citizen from false imprisonment in charges of contempt."

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, it may be a bit difficult to explain the purpose of this amendment, but nevertheless I feel it ought to be suggested to the House. Section 20 provides a remedy for the trial of contempt cases. Section 21 provides the method of appeal. The contempt has been stated to be inherent in every court of record under common law. It is not a crime; it is inherent because of the necessity of some power for the self-preservation of the court. It will be a very sad day when the court will not exercise or have that power. However, we have found that there should be limitations upon that power, like there have been upon other powers.

In section 20, as I stated, we have provided for a jury trial. In section 21 we place the contempt along in the category of crimes, and we provide that it shall be under the law governing criminal cases.

Of course gentlemen may reply that the Constitution prohibits the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, but it does not take away the power to supersede it with additional or other writs. Suppose in a certain jurisdiction it was not a violation to sell liquor and some one was imprisoned for selling it. In such a case there would be no remedy in criminal procedure, and the only relief would be the writ of habeas corpus. But suppose it was made a crime to sell liquor, then he could not be liberated under the writ, because the law making it a crime would provide a procedure, so that the writ of habeas corpus in that case would be superseded. In this bill you have a writ of error, and it provides for a bond. The fellow who can not make the bond you have subjected to burdens, which could not be permitted under a writ of habeas corpus. If he can not make his bond, he will have to lie in jail, while the writ of habeas corpus, the highest writ of liberty, gives him a speedy relief, and I offer this amendment in view of those changes in the matter of procedure, and I think it essential to protect those men who happen to be fined for contempt, who would be unable to make bonds. I think it was an error to place contempt cases side by side with criminal trials.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, this is a criminal matter. It has been generally known as criminal contempt we are dealing with. If that were not so, we would not be interposing a jury between the judge's sentence——

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Oh, no; that is a question only of limitation—the interposition of a jury, just as we have limited their powers in other branches, and it is not a question of crime.

Mr. WEBB. Wherever a judge can put a man in jail we regard that as a sort of criminal or quasi criminal action, and therefore we have no apologies to make for preserving the defendant's rights in this bill as rights should be preserved in all criminal cases.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. There is nothing to keep the defendant in a contempt case from suing out a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. WEBB. Nothing.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. There are some classes that could not under this procedure.

Mr. WEBB. If he is indicted for murder or robbery, he always, of course, has the right of suing out a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. The gentleman does not undertake to say that in an indictment for murder a man could be liberated under the writ of habeas corpus except where he alleges that he was denied bail when he had the right to bail?

Mr. WEBB. He ought not to be allowed to do that in any case unless he alleges something entitling him to the writ.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. He can do it if he alleges that he is denied bail when he has the right to bail, but he can not relieve himself from the charge of murder by a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. WEBB. Of course not.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. You place contempt as a crime. It is merely a disrespect of the court under a power given to the court for self-preservation only.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, contempts are divided into criminal and civil contempts, and we are dealing with the criminal contempt in this bill, and we preserve the right to appeal and the right to sue out a writ of habeas corpus if the defendant can show that the court has no jurisdiction or that he has been subjected to an unusual or cruel punishment or excessive bail, and so forth, has been required. In those circumstances he can then go to court and sue out a writ of habeas corpus as in all other criminal cases, and we have preserved the defendant's rights absolutely in this section, which seems to be satisfactory to our labor friends and all others, so far as I know, and I do not see the necessity of accepting this amendment, because the rights of every defendant under this bill are preserved. So far as the writ of habeas corpus is concerned, that is a constitutional right, and a defendant can always exercise it whenever he has a proper case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of, or on behalf of, the United States, but the same, and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 19 of this act, may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 39, line 25, after the word "prevailing," strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following: "Provided, That in no case shall a penalty or punishment be imposed for contempt until a trial is had and an opportunity to be heard is given the accused."

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the unfortunate part of this paragraph is the closing words:

And all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 19 of this act may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

What are these "usages"? In some jurisdictions the "usage" has been for the court to say, "Mr. Marshal, place the man in jail." I remember in the old Indian Territory, under the Federal jurisdiction, as a practitioner at the bar, I was fined $25 by the court without a word. That was the usage there. I remember on a subsequent occasion I said to the court that he had no power to charge the jury, because his court was less than a court of record under the common law. He ordered me to jail for three days, and on a writ of habeas corpus I was liberated. That is the usage in many jurisdictions.

Gentlemen seem to enjoy the fact that the court sent me to jail. He ordered me to jail, but I did not go. I have been fined for contempt many times, but I never have suffered the penalty.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman did not go to jail, and instead they sent him to Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Yes; later.

Mr. CARTER. But not for the same offense. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. No.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. No; I desire to get back to my subject.

Mr. MOORE. This is right in point. If they did not send the gentleman to jail, did they not send him to Congress?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Those fellows did not send me to jail, but the people who limited their powers sent me to Congress. So in this provision in this law the only difference between it and the Oklahoma constitution is that wherever the United States is a party there is no jury trial. I think it is correct to provide in the law that the judges shall fine as for contempt where the contempt is in the presence of the court or is liable to obstruct the due process of justice. I think that is necessary and that the court should have the right without a trial by jury. But no man should be imprisoned without a hearing. The first element of contempt is the intent, just as is the "intent" coupled with an act which makes a crime. And so we placed in the Oklahoma constitution, and I think it is proper here, a provision that no man should be punished for contempt without a trial, without a hearing. You have provided over here a trial by the court or a trial by the jury, if the one committing the offense demands a trial by jury; but in this case, where the contempt is committed in the presence of the court, there is no trial, or in the case of the disobedience of a writ, where a suit is brought on behalf of the United States, which may be outside of the court, the defendant is not guaranteed a trial by court or by jury. I am not urging in this kind of cases that there ought to be a trial by jury, but I believe, as Judge Hurt, of Texas, said when Jerome Kirby cursed Judge Flint in the open court and the judge sent him to jail without writing the charge on the docket, that no man should be sent to prison without putting upon the docket why he was sent to prison. To do so would jeopardize the liberty of the citizen.

So, in this class of cases, let the trial be before the court; let him have a trial and let him have an opportunity to be heard and let him state whether it was intended or show such extenuating circumstances that might tend to liberate him so that the record might be made.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Would you have that trial take place before the same judge?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Certainly I would; and then we have a record——

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. And would the gentleman have it take place at the immediate time when the contempt was alleged to have been committed, or subsequent, or when?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I would let the judge fine him for contempt, but no punishment to be had until the accused was heard and had a trial.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Heard before whom?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Before that same judge.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. When?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. At any time when it suited the judge, but he can not "punish" him, understand.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Is not that a proceeding where the very fact there is any proceeding at all shows the judge who is going to do the trying says in advance there has been a contempt?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Yes; but it does this: It gives opportunity to have a record made, and when the record is made he, when he is punished or attempted to be punished, may appeal to the higher court and in that case invoke the right of habeas corpus to liberate him upon the record that shows he ought to be liberated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Oklahoma may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. There might be a record of certain facts, but is there any record of impartial testimony or an impartial finding on impartial testimony?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. There is a record on both sides in the hearing in the one case, just as the judge makes a finding upon knowledge in his own mind. Under the proceeding I offer, you have the statement of the accused, you have both sides of the question, and you have a higher court to pass upon it.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. But in the first instance, before the higher court passes upon it at all, there is a decision of the judge that there has been contempt committed in his presence, and the judge in whose presence the contempt was committed would send this man to jail or——

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. It does not follow in that case in his presence alone, if he violates any writ——

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Well, let us take first the direct contempt, committed in the presence of a judge. The gentleman's plan, as I understand it, is he would have the judge against whom the contempt was directed immediately suspend a trial that might be going on for the purpose of hearing the testimony in reference to the alleged contempt.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. No, sir; it is true the judge in the exercise of discretion left him under the law will wait until he is through with the case until an opportune moment, and then try, but he would not punish until he had that trial.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Well, I know, but my objection is not as to the time nor the manner in which the trial for contempt is had. I do not like the idea of the same judge who says the man has been in contempt, trying the man who he says had committed the contempt.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I do not agree to the idea every time some man wants to swear a judge off the bench it ought to be permitted. I believe, in the first place, in giving the court enough power to preserve the dignity and strength of the court, and I believe in that doctrine thoroughly; but I do not believe in the case of contempt against the judge that some other judge ought to be summoned, but I do believe in giving the accused an opportunity to get in his evidence, and——

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Is not there as much opportunity of maintaining and preserving the dignity of the court by a proceeding before a jury or before a separate justice? Is it not a far better plan to preserve the dignity and security of the court to have the proceeding before a jury of impartial men than to have a finding by a man who says he was aggrieved when the man committed the contempt?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Not in the case of a direct contempt.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. I could not hear what the gentleman said in reference to the provision in the Oklahoma constitution about not permitting people to be locked up until they had been tried; but I understood the gentleman to say that if a policeman arrested a drunk or disorderly or arrested a man committing a crime he could not lock him up until after he has been tried.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Could not punish.

Mr. MANN. "Could not lock him up," the gentleman said a while ago.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. "Punish" is the word used in this amendment. He may hold him in custody.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman make a distinction between locking up and punishing?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Punishing and imprisoning.

Mr. MANN. Locking up is imprisonment; punishment may not be, but locking up is.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, we can not agree to go so far as my friend from Oklahoma desires us to go in his amendment. This section provides that a judge may punish for contempt summarily those contempts committed in his presence.

Now, something has been said about the integrity of the courts, and I want to make this observation: If you take that power away from the courts, then you do destroy the very basis of the court's integrity and its power to protect itself. In other words, it ceases to be a court.

Another is where the contempt is committed not in the actual presence of the judge but so near thereto as to disturb the proceedings of the court; that is the business of the people.

The third is where a person violates an order in a suit brought by the United States. That provision was put in there, gentlemen, as most of you know, for the purpose of giving the court the power to enforce its orders in antitrust suits.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman understand that this amendment changes that a particle?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. You provide for a trial, and it would be a farce for a judge sitting on a bench to hear a man, say, break out in some cursing language or abusive language, or some violent outburst of temper, and then say, "I will try you to see if you did that," when he was sitting there himself and heard it. A farce like that ought not to be required in a courthouse.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. How does that trial lessen the dignity of the court when the judge of the court himself finally tries and passes upon the evidence and the law and fines the defendant? How does it check his ability to conduct the court?

Mr. WEBB. There are some things that ought not to be allowed in a court, and when a man infringes on the privileges of the court the judge ought to have the right to stop him right there, without going through the formality of a trial.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a man on trial went into a court room with a dozen rotten apples in his pocket, and he fired one at the judge, and the gentleman from Oklahoma, acting as a judge, should postpone consideration of that until the man had fired another rotten apple, and still another, and so on until he had fired a dozen? [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBB. Do you say rotten apples?

Mr. MANN. Yes; or it might be rotten eggs, for that matter.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Do you object to the provision of this amendment that says he shall have a hearing? Would you be willing to strike out the word "trial" and say he shall not be punished until the accused has an opportunity to be heard?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, in reply to that, there may be a few judges in this country who are so arbitrary as not to give a man a chance to purge himself of contempt; but I know very few of them, and rather than cast suspicion and reflection on every judge by passing this sort of an amendment I would prefer to take the chances of impeaching the judge who violates that rule in his practice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for just five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CARLIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, how many minutes does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Say three minutes.

Mr. CARLIN. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] urges that this is a reflection upon the courts. How much more a reflection is it to take away from the court entirely the trial of the case and put it before a jury? There is your first reflection upon the court.

Mr. WEBB. Let me answer the gentleman there.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Let me finish, and then I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. When a crime is committed, say, 10 miles from the presence of the court, and it does not involve the organization and integrity of the court——

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Yes; and you except every writ and order and every decree and every command wherever a suit is brought on the part of the United States and in its behalf.

Mr. WEBB. That is to protect the big trusts of the country.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. And when that is brought, a man may be a thousand miles away, and under this provision he has not a jury trial. I am not urging that he has not even an opportunity to be heard in a case like that. Now why, if one is a reflection on the court, is not the other also a reflection on the court? I would be the last man in the world to reflect upon the courts as such. I believe in preserving to the courts power enough to protect the dignity of the courts.

Mr. WEBB. Did you ever hear of a case where a court did not give a man a right to purge himself of contempt?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. The usage in this bill is the old usage. It was the usage in the old Territory of Oklahoma. I have been fined myself more than once in that way. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has it never occurred to the gentleman from Oklahoma that we are legislating here for other States than Oklahoma? [Laughter.]

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. They do not do that now in Oklahoma, because this is in the constitution, and we have no difficulty in preserving the dignity of the court.

Mr. CAMPBELL. There is no such practice in other courts. Even if a man has been convicted, the court allows the defendant to say something before sentence is pronounced.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That has been the practice in the inferior Federal courts. That is the usage, not the law.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That does not obtain in Kansas in any court, not even in a justice's court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. A division, Mr. Chairman!

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the statements made this morning by one of the Washington papers as to my attitude on the Webb amendment to section 7 of the bill now pending so completely misrepresented my position in the matter that I wish to state on the floor here as clearly as I can just what my position was and is on the matters involved in that amendment. I did not vote for it. In my judgment, the contentions of Mr. MURDOCK and Mr. MACDONALD to the effect that the amendment is ambiguous and uncertain, and probably will prove ineffectual so far as the purposes sought to be accomplished by the labor organizations are concerned, are correct.

But assuming that it does go as far as its proponents say it does, it then exempts "fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations"—to quote the language of the bill—from the operation of the antitrust laws.

The real friends of this amendment contend that in effect it excludes these organizations from the operation of the antitrust laws just as clearly as the amendment offered by Mr. MACDONALD, of Michigan, proposed to do in very plain terms. I am opposed to any such wholesale exemption of these or any other organizations from the operation of the antitrust laws.

I do not believe that the acts of combinations of labor should be regarded by the law precisely as the acts of combinations of capital are. Their legitimate objects are different, and the proper means employed to reach their ends are likewise different, and therefore their operations should be regulated differently by the law, but nevertheless the acts of both should be regulated. Laws should be enacted regulating the activities of each kind of organization—the one founded on capital and the one founded on labor.

I will admit that the so-called antitrust laws are designed primarily to regulate combinations involving capital. But they prohibit the doing of certain specified things and the making of certain kinds of contracts by anybody. These laws now are held by the courts to operate to prevent organizations of labor from doing certain things that I believe they ought to have the right to do under the law. A strict interpretation of the law might, as their leaders contend, threaten the very existence of the organizations. In these respects the laws should be changed. Organizations of the kind mentioned in this amendment have a right to exist. They have rendered a great service to civilization. They have a field of activity which is proper, is needed, and in the exercise of which the law should protect them.

But also the antitrust laws operate to prevent these organizations from doing certain other things that I believe they ought not to have the right to do under the law. The Webb amendment does not distinguish between these two classes of activities which such organizations indulge in, but with one stroke exempts such organizations from the law entirely, thus making it possible for them to engage not only in proper acts, but improper ones. For instance, under this amendment a labor organization could not only engage in a strike, entirely justified under conditions existing, which might operate to restrain interstate commerce, but it could establish a boycott or a secondary boycott.

It seems to me that a proper amendment would be one seeking to take out from the operation of the law not certain kinds of organizations, but the doing of certain acts. It is the act itself that should be the criterion. Certain acts should be prohibited and others permitted, and the law should apply to everybody and to all kinds of combinations. But to me it becomes unwarranted class legislation when we prohibit the doing of certain things and then provide that certain persons or combinations of persons shall not be bound by the law. That is what this amendment does, and therefore I could not support it.

The Sherman law declares that every "contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal." That law also says that every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished as provided in the law. Further, the law says that every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished as provided.

The Webb amendment will, if this bill passes, write into the law of this country a paragraph providing that fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations instituted for the purpose of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, and the members of such organizations "shall not be construed or held to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws."

I am as good a friend of labor as my Progressive colleague from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD] or my Progressive colleague from California [Mr. NOLAN] or my colleague from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] or any other Member of this House. I am against every form of oppression and unfair and unreasonable treatment that the laboring man has had to endure, and in some cases is still enduring. And I shall do all I can for the early enactment of every reasonable and proper law that seeks to put an end to such things. I will vote for all measures included in the program of social justice, but I could not support such an amendment as this. Labor organizations have long been seeking equality of treatment with organizations representing the other end of the economic structure. I think they should have that treatment, and am willing to do all I can to give it to them. But why they should have more than that I fail to see. I am just as much opposed to creating a privileged class out of the organizations specified in this amendment as I have always been to creating a privileged class out of organizations of capital. One practice is just as vicious as the other.

The Webb amendment goes to the length of saying that a monopoly or a restraint of trade shall not be indulged in by any kind of organization except those specified in the amendment. In determining what organizations or what kinds of organizations come or should come within the antitrust laws, the true test to apply is not what is the organization, one involving capital or one involving labor, but the true test is what does the organization do. Does it restrain commerce or not; is it a monopoly or is it not.

If a contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, is undesirable and is illegal, as it is declared to be by the Sherman law, it is so no matter who the person or what the organization may be that is involved. Can it be that a restraint of trade or a monopoly or conspiracy to that effect is bad where a corporation for profit is the actor involved but is perfectly harmless and quite proper where a labor union or a farmers' organization is the one involved? If monopolies or conspiracies in restraint of trade are a bad thing, they are a bad thing, no matter by whom, no matter by what kind of an organization they are fostered. To prohibit them by legislation except where they are perpetrated by labor or fraternal organizations or farmers' associations or the members thereof is as clear an example of unwarranted class legislation as can be furnished.

It is mere folly to contend that simply because labor is a human attribute and capital is a mere inanimate thing that combinations of those who deal solely in the former ought not to be hampered in such acts as operate to restrain trade while those who deal in the latter commodity ought to be prohibited from doing any acts having such a tendency.

Again I say, if restraint of trade and monopoly and conspiracy to that end are wrong, what matters it whether that restraint is brought about by the manipulation of that which is a human attribute or that which is an inanimate thing? The antitrust laws relate to combinations of persons, not of capital nor of labor as such, and to certain acts by those persons. Capital in itself can do nothing, nor can labor. It is with the owners and the manipulators of these things and the way in which those owners use these things as distinguished from the things themselves that the laws should have to do.

But this amendment says that these laws shall not apply to these persons so long as the thing that they use and manipulate to restrain trade is a human attribute—labor—and that all such persons shall be exempt from the operation of the law.

If the Webb amendment had specified certain proper acts and kinds of acts usually engaged in by such organizations as are named in the amendment, and which are now prohibited by a strict construction of the antitrust laws, and had provided that they might be legally done notwithstanding the antitrust laws, I would have supported the amendment.

It is the acts proper in themselves that should have been excepted from the operation of the antitrust laws, and the laws, with the exceptions adopted, should apply to everybody and every kind of organization. But in excepting certain organizations and classes of individuals from the operation of the law not only acts proper in themselves, such as a peaceful strike, are legalized, but acts not proper in themselves, such as a secondary boycott, are legalized.

I am opposed to any exemption which has such an effect or which might be so construed, and therefore I did not support the Webb amendment, and I also voted against the MacDonald and Thomas amendments.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, section 22 includes among the exceptions any case in the name of or on behalf of the United States. Does not that exception include receivership cases, where railroads, for instance, would be in the hands of the court and the court would enter orders concerning them? Are not all those cases conducted in the name of the United States?

Mr. WEBB. No; this is where the United States is a party to the suit.

Mr. BRYAN. But it does not say that. It says—

In the name of, or on behalf of, the United States.

My present impression is that these orders in receivership cases are issued in the name of the United States in the Federal courts.

Mr. WEBB. I think this does not cover those cases.

Mr. BRYAN. I will not offer any amendment, but I think you will discover an indefiniteness here.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That no proceeding for contempt shall be instituted against any person unless begun within one year from the date of the act complained of; nor shall any such proceeding be a bar to any criminal prosecution for the same act or acts; but nothing herein contained shall affect any proceedings in contempt pending at the time of the passage of this act.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to come in as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments to perfect the text of section 23?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up any of the time of this committee during this debate. Those who desire the freedom of action of the labor people of the country expected that we were going to have the practically unanimous support of the House to those amendments that we believed would exempt the labor people of the country—organized labor—in their liberty of action that the Constitution of the United States is supposed to guarantee.

It was stated on the floor, in the discussion of section 7, that the amendments adopted were a compromise on the part of the representatives of labor. While I do not assume to speak for organized labor, and while I am not wholly familiar with their thoughts in regard to the matter, I believe it is safe to say that they consider the question of exemption from the operation of such laws as the Sherman antitrust law, and laws created for the purpose of preventing the monopoly of commodities, as being entirely separate and apart from the questions involved in the activities of organized labor. They consider it so important to have human beings in their normal activities freed from the operations of the Sherman antitrust law that there is absolutely no chance for them to agree to any sort of a compromise, so far as that is concerned. While it is true that those of us who considered this question of such great and vital importance to the wageworkers of the country at first desired an amendment providing that the antitrust laws shall not apply, we believed that the amendment finally agreed upon was fully as strong as the amendment that we had first proposed.

I wish to say we did not accept that amendment as any sort of a compromise. We believed that the Democratic Party, the Progressive Party, and even the Republicans, the great majority of the Members of this House, had seen the light in regard to this question. We believed that they had plainly seen the difference between commodities and living human beings; in other words, that they had come to the conclusion that humanity was in a different class from a ton of coal, a bolt of cloth, or a pile of bricks, and therefore did not consider this to be class legislation of any sort, or any special privilege. In other words, labor organizations do not desire to be permitted to buy up and monopolize any commodity for the purpose of profit, but they do want to be placed in the same status—in other words, to be restored to the same status—in which they were before the Sherman antitrust law was twisted to apply to their activities. On this question there could be no compromise. If it was simply a question of language that meant the same thing, then we were not so much concerned. While personally I believed in making the language short and clean-cut, so that there could be no doubt in regard to the matter, and while so far as I was concerned I was willing to make the issue a clean-cut one. I claim that it is high time that the people of this country know how their public servants stand on this question, whether or not they really mean to give to the labor people of this country, who bear the burdens of industry, that freedom of activity guaranteed them by the Constitution. They believe the time has now come when judges shall not be permitted to strangle justice and liberty by construing and applying laws contrary to the intention of the creators of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KINDEL. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado objects.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Now, Mr. Chairman, may I offer my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma moves to amend, on page 40, by adding a new section, to follow section 23, and to be numbered section 24, as follows:

"SEC. 24. That whenever any United States attorney shall have reliable information that any corporation engaged in commerce in the manufacture, sale, or distribution of any necessity of life, or of any article, product, or commodity in common use is a virtual monopoly, or by reason of the nature, character, or extent of its business the absence of effective competition or for any other cause possesses the power to arbitrarily control the price or prices of any necessity of life, or of any article, product, or commodity in common use, or controls the price or prices paid to the producers of any article, commodity, or product in common use, or controls the price or prices paid for the product of any mine, or of any oil or gas well, it shall be the duty of said United States attorney, under the direction of the Attorney General, to file a petition in the United States court against said corporation alleging the aforesaid facts, and praying that the said corporation shall be adjudged a quasi-public corporation and made subject to the control of the Commissioner of Corporations or subject to the control of any commission that, at the passage of this act or thereafter, may be the successor of the Commissioner of Corporations, in all its practices, prices, and charges in like manner and to the same extent that common carriers are now subject to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and if the court shall find that the material facts alleged in the petition are true it shall render a decree adjudging the said corporation to be a quasi-public corporation, and adjudging the said corporation to be subject in all its practices, prices, and charges to the control of the Commissioner of Corporations or the commission, as the case may be, as prayed for in the petition: Provided, That thereafter the practices of said corporation in conducting its business and the prices at which it shall sell its products and the price or prices it shall pay the producer of any of the articles, commodities, or products mentioned in this section shall be just and reasonable."

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CARLIN. I desire to make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this bill.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I should like to be heard on that point of order. I did not quite get the ground of the point of order, and I wish the gentleman would state it again.

Mr. CARLIN. That it is not germane. As I understand, the amendment relates to the duties of the trade commission.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No; it provides for a proceeding whereby we may control a virtual monopoly.

Mr. CARLIN. I withdraw the point of order. Let the gentleman discuss the merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia withdraws the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I do not present this amendment as expressing my conception of what should be done as a broad, comprehensive, effective measure to control the industrial corporations of this country, commonly known as trusts.

In the bill No. 18711, which I introduced in the Sixty-second Congress and which I reintroduced in this Congress, I have presented my idea of the administrative machinery that is needed in the form of a Federal trade commission, the power that should be conferred upon this commission, and the laws that should be enacted to enable the Federal Government to exercise the proper and necessary control over our large industrial corporations in both their practices and prices. But we have completed the consideration of the bill to create an interstate trade commission without conferring any adequate power upon the commission to exercise the control over our large industrial corporations which is demanded for the proper protection of the people of this country.

We have had this bill—House bill 15657—under consideration for a number of days. The last section has been read, and I propose a new section to follow the last section, which I believe would add materially toward securing substantial and beneficial results under the bill.

While the amendment does not express my idea of what should be done, I am certain it is a step in the right direction, and if it were adopted splendid results would follow therefrom. Then, having ascertained that the majority in this House will not go as far as I think we should go, I present this proposition, hoping the majority will go a part of the way in the right direction, for a half of a loaf is better than none.

Mr. Chairman, I want the Members of the House to get clearly in mind that this provision only applies to corporations which arbitrarily control the price or prices of some necessity of life or of some article in common use among the people.

It does not apply to all industrial corporations, however much their capital or wealth may be, but it narrows it down to providing a procedure against a corporation that possesses the arbitrary power to control the prices of a product in common use or of some necessity of life. And before that power shall be exercised, under this section that I propose, the United States attorney is required to file a suit in court, citing and bringing the corporation into court, giving that corporation the right to defend, and if after a full hearing the court shall find on the single issue that the corporation does control the price of a product in common use or of some necessity of life, then the court is given authority to adjudge that corporation a quasi public corporation and subject to the control of the Commissioner of Corporations or the commissioner that may be made his successor in the same manner that common carriers are subject to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

In proceeding under the Sherman antitrust law we have two remedies. We may dissolve the corporation or fine it. The amendment which I have offered provides a new remedy. And a new remedy is needed. Under the Sherman law the American Tobacco Co. and the Standard Oil Co. were dissolved. But it is generally believed that some of these companies still possess the power to control prices of their products, yet there is no remedy, no procedure, for relief. In my own State the Standard Oil Co., or one of the branches into which it was divided by the court, absolutely controls the price of petroleum and its products in that State. The same company controls the price of products throughout other States of the Union. Under the law as it now exists our people are powerless. There is no procedure by which they can free themselves from the monopolistic power of this gigantic corporation.

Now, when you undertake to dissolve a corporation under the Sherman antitrust law you must prove the conspiracy and you must prove many things before you get a decree against it. In this procedure there would be one single proposition to prove, one single issue—Does the corporation control the price of any necessity of life or of any product in common use among the people? If, after a hearing in court, this question shall be answered in the affirmative, say, that the corporation ought not to be brought under the control of the Federal Government, who will say such corporation should be permitted to continue with this power to levy tribute upon the people? Such corporation has ceased to be a mere private business concern, making reasonable profits under competitive conditions. It is not profits it makes, but it is levying tribute; for a great corporation, controlling the production and the prices of an article in common use, really possesses the taxing power.

Now, I appeal to you to let this section go into this law. Give the people an additional remedy. Give the people a procedure whereby they may go into court and determine what power a big corporation has to arbitrarily control prices of articles in daily use among the people.

We hardly realize, I think, to what extent the prices of products in common use in this country are within the arbitrary control of great corporations. The farmer goes to town, and perhaps he wants to buy coal. He visits the coal yards, and they have all the same price. He wants to buy lumber, and he visits the lumber yards, and they all make the same price. He goes into a dry goods store to buy clothing for his family, and he finds that they all sell at the same price. He wants to borrow some money, and he goes to the banks, one after another, and they all charge the same rate of interest. Now, the local merchants are not to blame; they must have a reasonable profit; but they buy of big corporations which practically fix the prices at which local dealers must sell. But the farmer comes to town to sell his corn, wheat, or cattle, or hogs. He finds the prices at which he must sell his products are largely fixed by big corporations doing business in the great cities, the centers of trade and commerce. This is what the people are complaining about. This is the thing from which they ask relief. Do you propose to pass this trust bill without giving the people a single additional remedy? Do you think the people will think you have done your duty when you have prohibited a few things? The things which you have prohibited in this bill will not materially change present conditions. All the provisions in this bill are not sufficient to destroy a single trust or to take away from a single corporation the power to control the prices of articles in common use. [Applause.]

In our antitrust legislation we should keep clearly in mind what we want to accomplish, the evil to be eradicated, the result to be attained. We should have a definite program in mind. As I see it, this is what we want to do: Destroy monopoly, maintain competition, prohibit unfair practices, prevent unjust discrimination, secure equality of opportunity, insure reasonable prices, give protection to the people, encourage enterprise, reward industry, and promote prosperity. The one thing that is dangerous in a large corporation is its power to arbitrarily control prices—the prices not only of what people buy, but the prices of what farmers and other producers have to sell. Now, this is a power that no private corporation should have or can have with safety to the people. Now, then, I have suggested a procedure and the judicial and administrative machinery by which any corporation suspected of possessing this power may be brought into court and the question determined. If the corporation is found to possess this power, then I provide that its practices and the prices of its products shall be subject to the control of a Federal commission so long as that power exists. We control the rates and charges of our transportation companies and of our public utility companies solely on the ground that their charges are not controlled by competition. I submit that we have the same moral and legal right, and that there is the same public necessity to control the prices of the products of our great industrial corporations when they possess a like power to control the prices of articles in common use. More than this, it will have a great moral effect upon the great business concerns of this country when the Government may, by a judicial proceeding, determine what degree of monopolistic power they possess; and, in addition to this, when you have demonstrated to the people that either through effective competition or governmental control they shall be fully protected from monopolistic prices and charges, you will have taken a long step toward social and industrial peace. You will have contributed to the material progress of our country. You will have laid the foundation for the highest possible expansion of our trade and commerce. You will have strengthened the fabric of the Republic and added to the prosperity, contentment, and happiness of the American people.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, labor's representatives do not consider that they have compromised in regard to the amendments to this bill. I do not consider that the President has made any compromise nor undergone any change. To bear out my position I want to read what the President said about this legislation in his speech accepting the nomination of the Democratic Party.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the matter before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado makes the point of order——

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand that the gentleman from Colorado made a point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Colorado has made the point of order, but the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Colorado to make a point of order that the gentleman from Illinois was not confining his remarks to the subject. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I want to say now that the gentleman from Colorado made an erroneous statement a short time ago when he said that I objected to his remarks. I did object to his inserting some matter in the RECORD in regard to the Colorado strike, but I never objected to the gentleman making a statement on the floor.

Mr. KINDEL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. KINDEL. I want to correct the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. No; I do not yield. As I was saying, the President stated in his speech accepting the Democratic nomination:

> The working people of America—if they must be distinguished from the minority that constitutes the rest of it—are, of course, the backbone of the Nation. No law that safeguards their life, that improves the physical and moral conditions under which they live, that makes their (the working people of America) hours of labor rational and tolerable, that gives them freedom to act in their own interests, and that protects them where they can not protect themselves, can properly be regarded as class legislation or as anything but a measure taken in the interest of the whole people, whose partnership in right action we are trying to establish and make real and practical. It is in this spirit that we shall act if we are genuine spokesmen of the whole country.

Therefore, I say, Mr. Chairman, that when the President lends his support to legislation such as the amendment labor desires to secure in this bill, he has not undergone a change. I want to say, in addition to what I have said, that those who can not distinguish the difference between human physical and mental activity and commodities, in my opinion, are mentally unfit to pass upon matters that concern humankind. Before they are capable of coming to the right conclusions in regard to the matter they must understand that labor is not in the same class with commodities, that a human being can not be placed in that class In regard to the injunction, to me it is a reflection upon the republican form of government in this country where our forefathers spent their blood and lives for freedom and liberty that it becomes necessary to pass an act to give the citizens of our Republic that equality and liberty which the Constitution guarantees; and when we are passing measures to curb injunction judges, or, in other words, when judges enjoin citizens from exercising their legal and constitutional rights, they are usurping power and therefore committing a crime. I hear much said about the dignity of the judges, and I agree that the position of judge is a dignified position, but when those who are holding that position do not conduct themselves in accordance with the dignity of the position it is all the more reason why they should be criticized for the wrongs they commit.

The usurpation of power by the judges of our country has created public mistrust and contempt for our judiciary. When our judges are guided by the justice and patriotism of our forefathers, who freed us from the tyranny of monarchy, public respect and confidence will be restored; but when their decisions and constructions of the laws are influenced by the vicious combinations of the criminal rich they will continue to lose the confidence and respect of the great masses of the people.

Section 18 of this bill is a prohibition of restraining orders and injunctions by the courts of the United States. It does not legalize any act that is not already legal and constitutional, and therefore it is for the purpose of preventing judges from usurping power by issuing injunctions to prevent citizens from exercising their legal and constitutional rights.

I am unalterably opposed to government by injunction. I do not think that judges have any right to issue injunctions restraining citizens from violating the laws of the country, because in every State, county, city, District, and Territory of the United States the Government has its officials to enforce the laws, and in my judgment justice will be better served if the laws against violence and other necessary prohibitions are enforced in the regular way by giving a hearing and trial by jury, as provided in the Constitution and laws of the country. If wage workers violate the law they should be prosecuted the same as anyone else, no matter whether there is industrial strife or industrial peace; in fact, all they ask is to be on equal terms before the law with every other citizen.

The justice which affects men and women is not some impersonal, universal thing, but a force which accords them their rights in the relations with other men and women. Justice must be made effective in all the interests and phases of life. Since justice can only result through the conductivity of a human will, the human agent is the most important factor in securing it. Theoretically absolute justice is, of course, never realized in the actual, but we must at least approximate it. To be an agent of justice is a most serious function, requiring the highest qualities of heart and mind.

To do justice one must understand the past and the future. Whatever the judge knows of the past is part of his own mental background. Whatever he knows of the future is his prophetic instinct born of his knowledge of the human heart.

Knowledge is the mass of usable impressions and facts that have accumulated from environment, thought, and life. This knowledge is the means of interpreting the present. Whatever experience is not a part of one's knowledge can not influence the mind in deciding present problems. A judge whose mental capacity has never been keyed to the whir of modern industry and does not contain real experiences that enable him to step into the shoes of the man who works for an employer for wages can never get the viewpoint of those who view life from the machines of industry. If he can not get the viewpoint, he can never enter into that life to a sufficient degree to enable him to know justice for the affairs of that life, for he could never understand what it was all about. A man who does not take for granted the great things in human nature can not be an agent of justice, for he has no sense of the future into which the whole world is swinging. A judge who does not believe in the masses can apply only the letter of the law without understanding the spirit of justice.

Perhaps no more conspicuous example of the absence of the true judicial temperament can be found than Alston G. Dayton, Federal judge for the northern district of West Virginia. His official acts prove either that he is unable to understand the life of the masses of the people or that he has deliberately allied himself with a particular class interest against the welfare of the masses. Whichever is true, he is incapable of unprejudiced decisions and unable to perform duties in a manner requisite to justice.

In the article by Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, appearing in the current issue of the American Federationist some of Judge Dayton's official acts were discussed which have aroused condemnation of him as a judge and have brought criticism upon that which he represents. The miners in West Virginia endeavored to bring the judicial abuses of this judge before those authorized to remove him from office. Another effort to secure his removal is a resolution for impeachment proceedings against him introduced in this House by Congressman NEELY of West Virginia.

In the passage of the legislation embodied in this bill the Democratic Party is fulfilling its promises to the American wageworkers by enacting a law to protect them against judicial usurpation of authority and to secure to them full enjoyment of their rights, and it will secure for this administration and the Congress the confidence and support of the great masses of the American voters.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 9 to make a correction.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to return to section 9. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 28 amend as follows:
> "In line 20, after the word 'director,' amend by inserting the words 'officer or employee'. On page 29, in line 1, amend by inserting after 'director' the words 'officer or employee.' And in the same line, after the word 'elected' insert the words 'or selected'; and in line 3, on the same page, amend by inserting after the word 'election' the words 'or employment.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following further amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 30, after line 18, amend by inserting as a new paragraph the following:

"When any person elected or chosen as a director or officer or selected as an employee of any bank, or other corporation, subject to the provisions of this act, is eligible at the time of his election or selection to act for such bank or other corporation in such capacity, his eligibility to act in such capacity shall not be affected, and he shall not become or be deemed amenable to any of the provisions hereof by reason of any change in the affairs of such bank or other corporation, from whatsoever cause, whether specifically excepted by any of the provisions hereof or not, until the expiration of one year from the date of his election or employment."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 28, line 14, strike out "$2,500,000," and insert "$1,000,000."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is that amendment in order unless the gentleman has unanimous consent to offer it?

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. The gentleman returns to the section by unanimous consent, and he did not specify any particular amendment, and that opened section 9 for any other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that under the terms on which this section was returned to the amendment would be in order.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, this section 9 was not passed by unanimous consent. Section 12 was the only one that was passed by unanimous consent. I asked unanimous consent to return to section 9 to make some corrections.

Mr. MANN. It was for the purpose of offering amendments.

Mr. WEBB. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is entitled to offer his amendment, the Chair thinks, and the gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I drafted this amendment while the gentleman was talking, and the amendment ought to apply not only to line 14 but also to line 18. The purpose of my amendment is this: The bill provides that only those corporations having a capital stock and surplus of $2,500,000 can come within this act, prohibiting interlocking directors. Without this lowering of the amount to $1,000,000 many large banks, trust companies, and other concerns will escape the prohibition against interlocking directors. I really believe that $1,000,000 stock banks is too high to reach the evil, but certainly $2,500,000 banks will let too many out to reach the evil. I therefore trust the committee will let this amendment go in.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 11, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. WEBB. But one amendment?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. I suggest that the gentleman make it specific.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we return to section 11, in order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], a member of the committee, may offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the committee return to section 11 for the purpose stated. Is there objection?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would be glad if the gentleman would indicate what amendment he desires to offer.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not object. The committee is advised of what the amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That no writ of subpœna shall be issued to run for more than 100 miles from the trial court without the permission of the court being first had, upon proper application, and cause shown."

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, section 11, as I understand it, has been introduced for the purpose of enlarging the scope of the service of a subpœna. By its terms as the section stands the subpœna will run now throughout the whole of the United States without any limit or hindrance; and when one remembers that a subpœna is a writ of right and that upon paying the fee a subpœna may issue one can readily see how this bill puts it in the power of a person to summon an individual from California to come to New Jersey and vice versa, or from one end of the country to the other. Now, that is an extraordinary power that would expose all of our citizens to a severe hardship. It might lead to the ruin and destruction of a man's business, besides the severe inconveniences to which it would subject him.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. I think if the gentleman would change the amendment so as to read the writ should run to the judicial district the committee might accept it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I want to say in answer I am perfectly willing, although the existing law permits service of a subpœna upon citizens living outside the district for not over 100 miles from the court.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I understand the existing law permits the running of a subpœna 100 miles outside of the State. If it was limited to 100 miles within the State, there are plenty of judicial districts in the United States——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I beg leave to say that I am correct in my statement about the service.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Anywhere in the judicial district?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. And 100 miles from the courthouse for citizens living outside of the district. That is the law as it stands to-day. It may be necessary in some cases, there may be isolated exceptional cases, in which the power given in this bill ought to be exercised; but while we grant this power we should put a certain limitation upon it, that it must be made upon proper application and cause shown. It seems to me to be in the interest of all our citizens that this amendment should be allowed.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Does the gentleman's amendment apply to criminal cases as well as civil?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 59, noes 15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to section 12.

The CHAIRMAN. That will not be in order without unanimous consent to return to section 12.

Mr. TOWNER. I am not asking for unanimous consent.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, is this amendment to be offered by unanimous consent or by right of a Member?

Mr. MANN. We passed over section 12 yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that it will not be in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. We passed over section 12, and I think the committee is entitled to recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask to return to section 12, which was passed over yesterday, and I ask the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], who has a substitute for section 12, and no other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk a substitute for section 12, which I offer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the chairman of the committee ask unanimous consent to return to this section for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. WEBB. It was passed over last night, and we have a right to return to it. That is the order of business now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, amend by inserting in lieu of section 12 the following:

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is already a substitute pending. I offered a substitute for this same section yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair was not present on that occasion.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is shown in the RECORD.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I was not aware the gentleman from Minnesota had a substitute pending.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt about the gentleman from Minnesota having offered a substitute, and I asked to pass over the section until to-day, hoping to get together on an amendment.

Mr. GARNER. I suggest the gentleman from Arkansas withdraw his substitute.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Arkansas will be permitted to withdraw his substitute for the present. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota on yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 12 and substitute:
"Any person who shall do, or cause to be done, or shall willingly suffer and permit to be done any act, matter, or thing prohibited or declared to be unlawful in the antitrust laws or shall aid or abet therein, shall be deemed guilty of such prohibited and unlawful acts, matters, and things and shall be subject to the punishments prescribed therefor in the trust laws."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to change the word "and" in the second line to the word "or," and also by inserting in the last line the word "anti" before the word "trust," so as to make it read, "antitrust laws."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the proposed modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the amendment by striking out the word "and" in line 2 of the amendment and substitute the word "or"; and in the last line place the word "anti" before the word "trust."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call attention to this and to some extent compare it with the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Arkansas. I think this would meet the situation better than the one he has offered. In the first place, this does not undertake to change the extent of the punishments. This simply says that as to any act that is criminal under existing law, if any person does anything to aid or assist in doing that act, he shall be guilty just the same as the corporation. Now, that seems to me better, because you do not have to consider whether the punishment of $5.000 is the proper one, the sum mentioned by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas. Different sections of this act provide for different punishments, some greater than others.

This amendment is drafted in line with a similar provision contained in the interstate-commerce law and seeks to accomplish the purpose of that provision in substantially the same language. It uses languages quite generally used in criminal statutes. I do not see why we should not go as far as this does. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] does not go nearly as far as this, because it only provides punishments in case the individual authorizes or orders an unlawful act.

Now, why should not a person who willingly suffers or permits a thing to be done or who aids or abets in doing a thing denounced as a crime be guilty under this statute, just as he is under almost any other criminal statute? It seems to me there is no reason why we should be so extremely lenient to these violators of the law. Why should we not apply to them a statute like the statutes we apply to other offenders?

I do not think that there is anything further that I care to add. It is a simple proposition. If you desire to draw this statute so as to make the crime personal and carry out the promises made in your stump speeches let us put it in language so that it means something.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. He has very correctly stated that his proposed amendment goes very much further than the amendment proposed in section 12 as it is now written, and further than the amendment I propose to offer as a substitute for section 12, in case this is voted down. I have several objections to the wording of this provision. I think it is indefinite. I think it is too drastic and goes too far. It not only proposes to make unlawful the act of any person that aids and encourages, but also makes unlawful the acts of those who assist in any way those who violate the antitrust laws.

Now, in the operations, these great corporations with which we are dealing, under the broad terms of this language, every man that aids in any way in carrying out any unlawful purpose of the corporation would come within the scope of this provision.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the purpose of this section, it is to make the act of the individual punishable, although he is an officer of the corporation, and to make the corporation itself punishable.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; the corporation itself.

Mr. MANN. Why does not this language, inserted in a number of laws, cover the case identically—

When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any corporation, company, society, or association, within the scope of his employment or office, shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such corporation, company, society, or association as well as that of the person.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Well, I think that is entirely different. That makes the act of the individual the act of the corporation and holds the corporation responsible for the act of the individual, and the purpose of that provision is entirely different from and the reverse of the purpose of this section.

Mr. MANN. It makes the act of the individual punishable as to the individual, and also punishable as to the corporation. I understood that was the purpose of this section.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly; it makes the act of the individual punishable within itself, and also attributes to the corporation guilt on account of the act of the individual.

Mr. MANN. Yes. Here is an officer of a corporation who performs an act.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Our proposition is the reverse of that, in a sense.

Mr. MANN. The corporation must act through individuals. There is no other way for it to act. Now, you propose in a section, as I understand, that where an act is committed by a corporation, which, of course, must be committed through individuals, the individuals may be punished if they are officers or employees of the corporation. That is identically what is accomplished by this provision which I read, which I think, in the exact form it is in, was carried in the pure-food law, but it has also been carried in a number of acts passed since then. But it has met the construction that where an individual who is a member or an officer of a corporation fails to perform an act or commits an act the corporation can be punished for that and so can the individual.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is correct; but I like the provision that we present much better than that provision. Under the existing law the corporation may be convicted. True, as the gentleman from Illinois states, the corporation can only violate the law through the acts of its agents, officers, or employees; but we are proposing and seeking by this provision to visit guilt upon the real offenders.

Now, under the existing law, the man who does the act which constitutes a violation of the law can be punished as an individual, just as the corporation can be punished on account of the unlawful act of its agents or officers. But we propose by this provision to hold as responsible under the criminal statutes the man who authorizes or orders wrongful things to be done. In other words, we are seeking to reach the directors and the high officers of these corporations who authorize or direct their employees to do acts which constitute violations of the antitrust laws, and we much prefer the language we have used to that proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] or that suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I want to ask the gentleman from Arkansas this question: Are you quite sure that this does not make it necessary, first, to convict the corporation before you can indict the individual? I want to call your attention to the first part of this amendment. It says that "whenever a corporation shall be guilty, such offense shall be deemed also that of the individual directors." Now, are you quite sure that a court would not hold that you must first prove that the corporation is guilty?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. In answer to the gentleman's question, I will state that if it said "whenever a corporation is convicted" it would mean what he suggests.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It says "when they are guilty." They are not guilty in law until they are convicted.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not think the language here used would admit of that interpretation.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It seems to me that this is open to the same objection as the original section. While it is true that the original section requires a conviction, this section requires first a showing that the corporation is guilty, because until there is proof of guilt the court could not say that the corporation is guilty. Nearly all our antitrust suits are brought as equity suits, because it is of very little use to bring a criminal suit against a corporation. Consequently this will practically shield the persons participating in the guilty act by making their conviction depend upon the conviction of the corporation, which is not likely to take place.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that we do not make the conviction of an individual conditional upon the guilt of the corporation. We provide that where the corporation is guilty it shall be deemed the offense of the officers, directors, or agents authorizing, ordering, or doing the thing prohibited, but they may be guilty independently of that, and if guilty may be tried and convicted without reference to the guilt of the corporation.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I know; but if you make the guilt of the officers dependent upon the guilt of the corporation, you can not convict the officers until you convict the corporation. There is only one way known to the law under which you can prove the guilt of the corporation, and that is by a conviction; you do not want that, because you are wasting your time and energy in proving the corporation guilty. What you want to do with the corporation is to bring your suit against it in equity. And you want to be at liberty to bring your criminal suit against the officers at the same time for any violation of the antitrust law.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I hope the House will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I should like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. In the amendment which you have offered do you still include this phrase—

That whenever a corporation shall be guilty of the violation of any of the provisions of the antitrust laws——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think there is something in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. I do not believe, if that phrase remains in the section, any officer of a corporation can be convicted of a violation of the antitrust laws until after the corporation of which he is an officer has been convicted of it.

Mr. BRYAN. Criminally guilty, too.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Criminally guilty. Now let us look at it:

That whenever a corporation shall be guilty of the violation of any of the provisions of the antitrust laws, the offense shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation, and upon the conviction of the corporation any director, officer, or agent who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of such prohibited acts shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction therefor shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Now, as a condition precedent to the convicting of any one of these officers or agents you have first to establish the fact that the corporation has been guilty of a violation of the antitrust law through a judicial conviction.

Mr. BRYAN. And you have got to put it in your indictment.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. It is true that the corporation acts only through officers and agents, but it seems to me it would be much more direct language, and a much plainer provision, if you should say that any person acting or purporting to act as the agent or as an officer of an offending corporation, who does any of the things forbidden by the antitrust laws shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished so and so, and eliminate this requirement which, if it remains, must be given some meaning. You are seeking to convict a man of some criminal offense, and one of the conditions which the prosecution will be required to meet will be to prove the fact that the corporation has been guilty of a violation of the provisions of the antitrust laws. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is preferable.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. With pleasure.

Mr. McCOY. Is it not perfectly possible also that an officer of a corporation might commit an ultra vires act and the corporation not be liable, whereas all the while he might be doing something in violation of the law?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. That is true. A man who does something in violation of the provisions of the antitrust law may be doing something that is entirely beyond his authority as an officer or agent of the corporation, but yet the effect of his act is to bring about a violation and a transgression of the law as laid down in the antitrust statutes. It is my opinion that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is in better form and reaches the evil which you are seeking to reach more directly and certainly and perhaps more efficiently than the amendment suggested by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it is not true that there are a great many acts which, standing alone by themselves, are not wrongful, are not within the condemnation of the antitrust law, but which become wrongful only when committed or performed in furtherance of an unlawful combination, and therefore you must have the unlawful combination in connection with the performance of the act in order to reach what we ought to reach by this amendment?

Mr. CARLIN. In other words, you must have the offense by the corporation.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. That may be true in some instances, but it is also true that there are certain things forbidden by this bill that we are now passing—certain specific acts that if a man commits he violates the antitrust law. He need not be in conspiracy with anybody. It is not required that he shall be cooperating with anybody. If he commits any one of these acts, he violates the antitrust law. Now, why not say that the man who does one of these forbidden things, acting as an officer or agent of a corporation, shall be guilty of a violation of the antitrust law, and in that way make his guilt personal?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not understand that there was any agreement limiting debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may move to amend the amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last word and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] that the language read by the gentleman from Illinois was intended to operate just the converse of what is intended by this section, namely, to make the corporation liable for the act of the individual; but I agree also with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] who states substantially that the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] does not obviate the objections to the section as it now stands.

The section as it now stands undoubtedly requires two convictions before the guilt of the individual can be established and he be punished. As the gentleman from Texas has properly said, under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas the conviction of the corporation will still be required as a condition precedent. The gentleman from Arkansas said he thought the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota was too drastic, but it only embodies a general principle of the criminal law that whoever aids, abets, assists, assents to, or consents in an affirmative way to any criminal act is liable to all the consequence of it and may be punished.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman made a distinction between corporations being held responsible for the acts of the officer or agent and the agent and officer being held responsible for the acts of the corporation. Does the gentleman believe that if you convict the Standard Oil Co. of a criminal act, that that authorizes the conviction of every agent of the Standard Oil Co. throughout the United States in a criminal prosecution?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman either misunderstood me or I made a statement which I did not intend. As a matter of fact, I do not think this provision is needed at all.

Mr. MANN. As a matter of fact, can you convict a man of an offense of which he knew nothing and in which he did not participate?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; and the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota proposes nothing of the kind.

Mr. MANN. I am not talking about the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota. The gentleman from Iowa undertook to distinguish between a corporation being held responsible for the acts of the officers and the agents, and the agent or officer being held responsible for the act of the corporation. That distinction I can not get through my cranium.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That distinction was made by the gentlemen who drew the bill, and not by me.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Iowa was supporting it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; the gentleman misinterpreted me.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman does not change his remarks in the RECORD he will find that I am right.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as I stated a moment ago, the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota puts in force a principle of the criminal law that whoever assists a criminal to do a criminal act shall himself be liable. It is not a strange provision; it is one that has been applied in the Sherman law as it now stands. The amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota does not weaken the Sherman law, and I am inclined to think it strengthens it. Therefore I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota. We ought to have in this bill at least one provision that does not detract from the present law, and here is an opportunity to get it. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota will prevail.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I believe that much of the failure of the antitrust law is because, in most cases, the courts simply fine the corporation. I believe all these restrictive punitive statutes on this subject fail greatly for that very reason. I can not quite understand, although I know the courts have so held, how a corporation, the creature of the law, having no existence save for authorized purposes, can do an illegal act. Every unlawful act of a corporation is ultra vires, and the corporation is, in strict logic, incapable of doing anything except that which is in the proper sphere of its creation. Anything wrong or unlawful that is done is the authorized act of an individual, a director, officer, or agent of that corporation. I believe if you make these punitive statutes apply strictly to the officers of corporations who willfully do these ultra vires acts that you will eradicate much of the evils of corporate management. We have seen that fines amount to nothing. The officers of the corporation, and in the name of the corporation, go on and repeat the acts in spite of the repeated fines, but if you punish the men who use the powers of the corporation outside of the proper sphere of their duty, you will stop these repeated violations of the law. If you take hold of these men and punish them by imprisonment, much of the present disregard of law will cease. That is the way to stop this sort of thing. The fining of corporations means nothing; they simply go on with the acts of monopoly and collect those fines again from the people. [Applause.]

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I believe it to be much more important that this section of the bill should clearly provide for the prosecution of the responsible officers and agents of corporations violating the antitrust laws, independently of any prosecution of the corporation, chiefly for the reason that such personal liability is the practical way to stop the abuse of corporate power and for the additional reason that, logically and ethically, a corporation, having no power except for lawful purposes, can not conceive the intent to commit a crime, although I know the courts have held that a corporation may be indicted for a crime.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas) there were 39 ayes and 24 noes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. VOLSTEAD and Mr. WEBB.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were 40 ayes and 50 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The Clerk read, as follows:

On page 31 amend by inserting in lieu of section 12 the following:

"SEC. 12. That whenever a corporation shall be guilty of the violation of any of the provisions of the antitrust laws the offense shall be deemed to be a misdemeanor, and such offense shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of such prohibited acts, and any corporation violating any of the provisions of the antitrust laws or any director, officer, or agent thereof who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any such prohibited acts, upon conviction therefor shall be punished, if a corporation, by a fine of not exceeding $5,000; if a director, officer, or agent of a corporation, by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I will ask if we can not have some agreement as to the time on this section?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This is a very important amendment, and I think we ought to have some time on it.

Mr. WEBB. I ask unanimous consent that all amendments and discussion of this section be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, we want 15 minutes on this side.

Mr. WEBB. Very well; then I will ask that the discussion on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the paragraph and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I shall move to strike out section 12 entirely, and I may want a little time on that.

Mr. WEBB. And, Mr. Chairman, I ask that 15 minutes of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota and 15 minutes by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. And the gentleman further asks that one-half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota and the other half by himself.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Does this request apply to this amendment or to the section?

The CHAIRMAN. It applies to this section and all amendments thereto. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I regard this as a very important proposition, and I hope that gentlemen will hear me in defense of it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman's proposed amendment require the corporation to be convicted before a director or agent can be convicted?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not so understand it.

Mr. GARNER. I just read the amendment a moment ago, and I think it specifically states that when a corporation is convicted that then the acts of its agents and directors shall be considered——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon, but it says guilty.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Who is to determine whether the corporation is guilty?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. This is a question to be established by proof, as a matter of course.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Then it would have to be established in court.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to be perfectly frank. I desire to state that our idea was to so write the law that when one of those corporations had been found guilty that the parties who were responsible for that violation of law could be punished for the acts that constituted that violation of law as individuals.

If they commit acts held to be unlawful they can be punished now, as I suggest, but we can not reach the men who are really responsible, the men who authorize and direct the acts to be done. They shelter themselves under technical provisions of the law, and some subordinate or minor employee of the corporation, some man who is paid $5 a day for his services, as in the sugar case, is convicted and sent to the penitentiary, while the rich director or officer who sits back in his room and directs the employee to do the things prohibited and gives him $5 a week extra to violate the law is never touched and never convicted. Our purpose is certainly good, and if the House can help us in perfecting the amendment we will welcome their assistance. But we regard this section as important. If the individual now violates the Sherman law he can be convicted independently of the conviction of the corporation, but we seek to impute to the individual in this provision the guilt of the corporation, and subject him to punishment, but in all fairness we do not make him guilty without further trial. We provide he shall be indicted, tried, and proceeded against in the usual way. That is the purpose of this section.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Would it not be absolutely necessary in any prosecution against any individual to allege in the indictment that the corporation had been convicted, and would not the indictment be subject to demurrer unless that allegation was made in the indictment?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Under this particular section I will state to the gentleman that that might be true, but still that very fact would enable us to reach a class of cases that we can not now reach under existing law. But if the individual independently had violated the Sherman law and was guilty of violation of it in any way as an individual, he could be convicted without ever convicting the corporation, while if the guilt of the corporation is imputed to his acts as an individual, and those acts as an individual would not constitute a violation of the Sherman law, then under this provision, if written into the law, such acts would become unlawful and the adoption of this provision would bring these forbidden acts within the purview of the law and make the director, officer, or agent guilty, the guilt of the corporation being imputed to him.

Mr. TOWNER. But the injurious effect would be that you never could convict any individual without previously convicting the corporation.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The purpose of this section is to enable the Government, when it has convicted the corporation, to reach those responsible officers who have been proven in the trial to be guilty of a violation of law by presentment of an indictment and trial. It authorizes their conviction not only for acts done but for acts authorized or ordered to be done, and gentlemen who think this would be any protection to the corporation or its directors, officers, or agents and would give them any leniency entirely misconceive the purpose of this provision.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Is not this true, that the Government very seldom indicts a corporation? It brings a suit in equity, while this compels a double action if you seek to hold the individual criminally. It compels first a criminal action against the corporation and then perhaps a suit in equity, while under the law as it now stands you can indict and convict the individual without paying any attention to the corporation, so far as any criminal procedure is concerned, and you can at the same time pursue your remedy in equity.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. In answer to the gentleman's question I will say this: That this in no way affects the procedure under existing law, either criminal or civil. If an individual is guilty of violating the Sherman law, he can be indicted independently of this provision; but the series of acts which constitute a violation of the Sherman law are not crimes within themselves under existing law. If we adopt this provision, whenever a corporation is convicted of violation of the Sherman law and the guilt of the corporation is imputed to the individual officers or agents of the corporation, then acts done in furtherance of an unlawful combination become within this provision specifically indictable offenses that are not indictable now; and the result would be that you could indict and convict the officers and agents that were responsible for that violation on a state of facts on which they will go free now, no matter how often you indict them, because those isolated acts are not sufficient in themselves to constitute a violation of the Sherman law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Under this provision you would have to indict and convict the corporation, and then in the indictment against the individual you would have to allege the fact that the corporation had been indicted and convicted before you could convict the individual personally.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not so interpret it, but I do admit that you would have to show by proof in that trial that the corporation had been guilty of violating the Sherman law, or else prove that it had been indicted and convicted. But I do not admit that you would necessarily have to convict the corporation before you could proceed against the individual; the first burden of proof would be upon the Government, to show that they had violated that law, before the guilt of the corporation could be imputed to the acts of its officers or agents.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at this time. I desire to make this point clear. Now, we think this provision very important. We all understand that under the Sherman law, as it is written, there have been no criminal prosecutions of any consequence. Take the extreme position which seems to be entertained by those who oppose this amendment. They would have you believe that before proceeding against individuals you would have to convict first the corporation. What has been lost by the Government in criminal prosecutions if their construction is correct? How many convictions have been had in criminal cases in the 24 years of the existence of that law? The criminal provisions of the Sherman antitrust law have proven a failure in the past, and we are seeking by this provision and by this legislation to strengthen it and reach the men who are really responsible for its violations, and if we can succeed in doing that we will have fewer violations of law, because the men connected with these great corporations do not desire to go to jail and do not desire to be convicted of crimes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. For one question.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Does the gentleman contend that a person is not guilty under the present law if he authorizes or directs a violation of the law? Is there any question on that proposition?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not know how you can convict him if he has merely authorized and directed it.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. McCOY. Would the committee accept this as an amendment:

> Any person who, while acting or purporting to act as a director, officer, or agent of a corporation, shall authorize, order, or do any of the acts prohibited by the antitrust laws shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor—

And so forth?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the committee. The chairman of the committee is certainly right in saying that this is a very important matter. Nowhere else in the criminal law, either in State or Nation, is it necessary to convict two entities before one of them can be punished. By the provisions of this section it will be absolutely necessary to convict a corporation of which the individual is a member before you can ever convict any individual. In fact, it will be necessary that the indictment itself shall allege, in order to charge an indictable offense against the individual, that a conviction against the corporation of which the man is a member has been secured before the individual can be even placed on trial. I desire to call the attention of the committee further to this fact, that if you place any corporation on trial and it should be found that the act was not the act of the corporation, but was the act of an individual, ultra vires, without authority, then you would fail in the indictment against the individual, because you could not convict the corporation. The corporation would be acquitted, and you could secure no penalty against the corporation, and then you never could proceed against the individual, because, as a prerequisite to every indictment against an individual, if you adopt the form of amendment which the committee presents, it will be absolutely necessary to convict the corporation. I want to call the attention of the committee, if I can have it for a moment, to a substitute which I would like to have them consider, and this will be the only way, perhaps, to have it considered. It is to strike out all of the section and insert this:

> That in any case where a corporation has been convicted of a violation of any of the acts, matters, or things prohibited or declared to be unlawful in the antitrust laws the said conviction shall not be plead, offered, or received as defensive evidence or held as a prior conviction in a prosecution against any officer, director, agent, or member of such corporation.

I suggest to the committee that it will be necessary that you have some such provision if you intend to prosecute both the corporation and the individual, as I hope you do so intend. The section should contain a provision that the conviction of the corporation should not be held to be a prior conviction of an individual member of it. And then should follow this clause:

> And any officer, director, agent, or member of such corporation, who has authorized, ordered, or knowingly aided and abetted any act, matter, or thing prohibited or declared unlawful in the antitrust laws shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as provided in such antitrust laws.

It is in substance the same as the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota and that suggested just now by the gentleman from New Jersey. I think it is in better form than either of them, and in addition to what they contain is the provision that the conviction of the corporation can not be plead as a prior conviction of any individual member of the corporation. I submit it for the consideration of the committee without much hope of its being adopted, but at least we will have discharged our duty if we try to make the bill what it ought to be.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk. I do not ask for time to debate it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a question of order. Is this amendment being offered for information? The gentleman can not get recognition, as the time is in the control of the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not want any time.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman can not offer an amendment unless he gets time.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the time to offer an amendment is not included in the time that is divided up for debate. I have offered the amendment, and I have already been recognized for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I raise the question of order that the gentleman is not entitled to recognition.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. MANN. There was an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SIMS). The Chair understands there is a substitute amendment pending.

Mr. LENROOT. This amendment is not in order. The amendment is a substitute.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, my amendment had been offered after I was recognized, and I certainly expect it to be reported by the Clerk.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer this amendment, to strike out the section and insert——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a point of order against any amendment being offered while mine is pending.

Mr. MANN. He moved to strike out the section. That is in order.

Mr. BRYAN. My amendment is a motion to strike out section 12 and substitute therefor what I sent to the desk. That is the proposition.

Mr. MANN. It will not be voted upon until later.

Mr. BRYAN. If it is out of order to read my amendment, it will be out of order to read the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have time to offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there will be 30 minutes' debate on this section, to be equally divided. The Chair understand that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] yields himself time to offer his amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. I simply want my amendment read, Mr. Chairman, and of course I will accomplish that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] control the time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose this proposition. It is evident there is a disposition on the part of the majority to weaken instead of strengthen the Sherman antitrust law. It would be infinitely better to leave the law as it stands and depend upon the general principles of criminal jurisprudence to apply its provisions to acts of individuals than to add a section such as that which is proposed.

There can be no question but that, under the proposed amendment, it would be necessary first to establish the guilt of a corporation before you could convict an officer; and, besides, there is nothing in this proposed amendment that broadens or in any way strengthens the criminal statute as it stands to-day.

Gentlemen complain that we have not succeeded in convicting men in the years past. That is not true. In a great many instances men have been convicted and punished under the Sherman Antitrust Act. In some instances they have been sent to prison, although as a rule they have not been sent there for any great length of time. Under the law as it stands they can be convicted, and are constantly being indicted and convicted.

Why should we take away the power we have to-day to protect commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies? That is what you are trying to do. You are trying to place between the Government and these offenders an additional obstacle to conviction of the individual by first requiring the conviction of the corporation. You are asking the Government to prosecute a suit that is absolutely needless and useless in most cases. You can not put a corporation in jail—corporations must be reached under the equity powers of a court. But you are going to insist that before the individual can be punished the Government must waste its money on a criminal conviction of the corporation. This simply means that you are going to let go free the men who restrain commerce and create monopolies—the men who, in my judgment, are doing as much as anybody to increase the cost of living. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] consumed two minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. Is an amendment in order now, at this time?

Mr. McCOY. I offer my amendment as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] yields to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] one minute. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. Any person who while acting or purporting to act as director, officer, or agent of a corporation shall authorize, order, or do any of the acts prohibited by the antitrust laws shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction therefor shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both in the discretion of the court.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand this amendment is being read for information?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The gentleman has been yielded time.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment relieves the section from the criticism as it now stands or as the substitute proposes to do—that you must first convict the corporation before you can find any of these officers guilty. It simply provides that when any person acts or purports to act—and that would cover an ultra vires act—does the thing prohibited, he may be convicted. It makes guilt as personal as it can be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] half a minute.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, strike out all of section 12 and substitute the following: "That any person or corporation that violates any of the provisions of the antitrust laws, or any director, officer, or agent of any corporation that authorizes, orders, or permits to be done any act done by any corporation in violation of the antitrust laws, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. BRYAN. I think that is almost identical with the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY], but it provides that in order to make the individual guilty he must have advised, permitted, or authorized something to be done that was actually accomplished by the corporation in violation of the law.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I believe the committee amendment has been improved upon, but is still open to criticism. I think the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] is subject to criticism in this, that the whole thought and purpose has been that where there was guilt upon the part of the corporation any officer, agent, or director responsible in any degree for contributing to that guilt should also be personally guilty. The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey simply provides that where the officers, agents, or directors shall be guilty of any prohibited act they shall be punished, as I understand it.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. McCOY. It provides that any officer, agent, or director who authorizes or commits——

Mr. LENROOT. Any prohibited act.

Mr. McCOY. Any prohibited act.

Mr. LENROOT. That is just the trouble, because the act itself may not be prohibited by the antitrust law, and it takes the illegal combination and the act done in furtherance of it before it becomes a prohibitive act. Therefore we must have guilt on the part of the corporation, because in other cases your antitrust law without this section reaches the individual in every case.

Mr. WEBB. I thought the gentleman was one of those who did not want the necessity of proving guilt on the part of the corporation before we could reach the directors or officers.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not want to be compelled to convict the corporation before you can proceed against the officer, but I do insist that you must show in your action against the officers that the corporation is guilty, and then that the man you are proceeding against has performed some act that has contributed to the violation by the corporation; and when he has, he ought to be punished.

Mr. WEBB. You can only prove guilt by a conviction.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes, certainly; but you can prove the guilt of the corporation in your proceeding against the individual, or for this purpose you might first prove the guilt of the corporation in an equity action, if your amendment was properly framed to cover that, though, of course, that would not bind the defendant in the criminal action. I shall offer an amendment which, I think, covers the case.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is not the real object of the section that there shall be unlimited power of prosecution, both of individuals and corporations, but the additional power that when the corporation itself is convicted the officers and directors shall also be guilty of the thing which is denounced by the law.

Mr. LENROOT. Not denounced by the law, but where they have contributed in any degree to the violation, although their act, standing alone, might not be a violation.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment covers this ground specifically.

Mr. LENROOT. My amendment is to strike out the balance of the section and insert, so that it will provide that whenever the corporation shall violate any of the provisions of the antitrust laws—not leaving it to be determined in a criminal action; it may be determined in an action in equity—such violation shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation who shall have authorized or ordered or done any of the acts constituting in whole or in part any such violations. Those acts standing alone might be absolutely innocent, but if they have contributed in whole or in part to the violation by the corporation, then they make the party guilty. Then it goes on——

Mr. WEBB. I understand what the gentleman proposes. May I ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] if he agrees to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. CARLIN. I think that is all right.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Which amendment?

Mr. WEBB. The Lenroot amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not understand the provisions of it.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask that it be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the committee's substitute by striking out all after the word "corporation" and inserting the following:

"That whenever a corporation shall violate any of the provisions of the antitrust laws, such violation shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of the acts constituting in whole or in part such violation, and shall be deemed a misdemeanor; and upon conviction therefor of any such director, officer, or agent he shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. WEBB. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] if he is satisfied with this amendment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I am not able to discover where the difference comes in.

Mr. WEBB. I will ask that the amendment be again read, to see if we can not come to some agreement about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I shall be glad to explain the difference if I can get the time.

Mr. WEBB. I understand the difference, and I think the House does. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] expresses the judgment of the House on both sides; that is, that we wish to make guilt personal; that whenever a corporation violates any of the provisions of the antitrust laws the agents or directors, or those who are responsible for those violations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined or imprisoned. Now, I think that is exactly what my friend from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] wants done, and we are perfectly willing to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina withdraw the committee amendment?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. This is an amendment to the committee amendment. I offered the committee amendment, and I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment may be read, and then the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin read in connection therewith, so that we may have an understanding of the whole matter.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, I will state that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] supersedes the entire amendment that I offered except the first word.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has five minutes remaining.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, in order that he may answer some questions. Does this include all of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. It does. It is in the form of a substitute.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. What part of the original amendment does the gentleman retain?

Mr. LENROOT. The words "whenever a corporation shall"; that is all that is retained of the original amendment. Then it strikes out all of the balance of the amendment, so that it will read "whenever a corporation shall violate," and so forth.

Mr. WEBB. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will accept the amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No, Mr. Chairman; I shall not accept the amendment. This amendment is still open to the same objection that I made to other amendments—that it does not take into consideration the fact that for some offenses under existing law the fine is one sum and for other offenses it is a different sum. This makes a uniform punishment of a fine of $5,000 for every offense. We have some provisions in this bill that provide for a fine of $100 a day. Now, will this mean $5,000 a day? And this amendment does not add a particle to the existing law.

I believe that under the existing law we can reach every offense that could possibly be reached under this provision and a number of others.

In years past we have been able to prosecute and convict people under the antitrust laws. The trouble has not been that we did not have law enough; the trouble has been that jurors did not want to convict and officers did not always want to prosecute. They have had some sympathy for the men who have had the genius to build up these great combinations and their industries. It was not the fault of the law. It was the fault of the men who sat in judgment on the men who committed the offenses.

I am not going to consent to weaken the law. I can not see how you add a single thing to the law; on the other hand, you limit it by expressly providing that an individual is only liable if he authorizes or directs an act to be done. It is a familiar principle of the criminal law that anyone who knowingly aids or assists in doing an illegal act is guilty. You do not have to authorize or direct. Anyone that participates in doing a criminal act is guilty. You require that the offense shall be done in a particular way, and thereby exclude other methods of committing the crime. This is not going to add a single thing to the law; on the other hand, I can see clearly that it is going to weaken it very much. The effect of this amendment is to shield the individual and make the law less drastic than it is to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. MCCOY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SIMS). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCCOY. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin as a substitute for the committee amendment has been accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it is offered as an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. MCCOY. And the committee has accepted it.

Mr. LENROOT. It can not be accepted. It has to be voted upon.

Mr. MCCOY. What is the status of the substitute which I offered for the committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair understands the gentleman's amendment was simply read in his time for information.

Mr. MCCOY. I got the time in order to offer it as a substitute, and the Clerk so read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that it was offered for information of the committee, to be offered in the regular order at the proper time.

Mr. MCCOY. Assuming that is so, when is the time to offer it?

The CHAIRMAN. The agreement was made before the present occupant took the chair.

Mr. CARLIN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement all the amendments had to be offered. The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey took its place as a substitute for the amendment which is pending. We have accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. That arrangement was made before the present occupant took the chair.

Mr. MANN. There was no agreement about amendments. The agreement was as to debate.

Mr. CARLIN. The agreement was to close debate on the paragraph and all amendments.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but that does not close or shut off amendment. The committee offered an amendment, and the gentleman from Wisconsin offered an amendment to that amendment, and the gentleman from New Jersey offered a substitute to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the vote will come first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas. Then the substitute will be voted upon.

Mr. MANN. The vote would come first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin to the committee amendment and then upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from New Jersey and finally upon the amendment as amended, if it should be amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCCOY] for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Washington offered a substitute. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] in the nature of a substitute.

The question was taken, and the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], a member of the committee, as amended by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the proposed amendment which I send to the desk, to section 10 of the bill, may be read; and after it is read, then it is my purpose to prefer a request for unanimous consent to return to section 10 in order that it may be offered.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HULL). The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to return to section 10 in order to offer an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object. As the Chair states the request, it is to return to section 10.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, my proposition is that this proposed amendment be first read, and then, after it is read, it is my purpose to ask unanimous consent to return to the section. I wish the gentleman from Illinois would let me have the amendment read.

Mr. MANN. What is it about? Is it about anything in the section?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; it covers the provisions of the section, and I will ask the gentleman to let me have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the amendment be reported for information. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 3, page 31, after the word "inhabitant," amend by adding the following words: "or where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated"; and on line 4, page 31, after the word "district,' insert the following words: "where the contract is made or is to be performed or where the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs or," so that as amended it will read as follows:

"SEC. 10. That any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant or where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, but also in any district where the contract is made or is to be performed or where the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs, or wherein it may be found or has an agent."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I now ask unanimous consent that the committee return to section 10 for the purpose of considering the amendment

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the committee return to section 10 in order to consider the amendment just read for information. Is there objection?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I object. I now move that the bill as amended be laid aside under the rule with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, before that motion is put I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that there should be a verbal correction made in one of the amendments which was presented and adopted.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, that is right; and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to offer his proposed amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. To which section does the amendment apply?

Mr. WEBB. And I ask unanimous consent that we return to that section for that purpose alone. It is to section 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to return to section 11 to permit the correction of an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, let the amendment be reported first.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will explain to the gentleman that the amendment offered has already been adopted by the committee, but that it was drawn hastily, and there are some verbal corrections necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the proposed amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania:
Page 31, line 9, after the word "district," insert the following:
"Provided, That in civil cases no writ of subpœna shall issue for witnesses living out of the district in which the court is held at a greater distance than 100 miles from the place of holding the same, without the permission of the trial court being first had, upon proper application, and cause shown."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Does that limit the distance?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman offered his amendment a while ago, but as adopted it applies to criminal cases.

Mr. RAKER. That may be true; but if it is possible to keep out the question of distance, it ought to be kept out. In my State men have to travel four and five hundred miles in one district.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I will explain. It was the thought of districts like the gentleman's that suggested the importance of making this change. I know there are districts in which the extent from one end to the other would be four or five hundred miles, and therefore the limitation of 100 miles which applies with us in the eastern districts would not apply to them, because this amendment now leaves it so that the writ of subpœna runs all through the district, and the limitation is in the language of the old law, that where the witness resides outside of the district he can not be compelled to attend more than 100 miles.

Mr. RAKER. Outside the district?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; in conformity with the old statute. It is merely a verbal correction to make it conform to the law.

Mr. RAKER. With the amendment proposed by the gentleman, irrespective of what distance might be in the district—200, 300, or 500 miles—the subpœna will run to the outermost limits of that district?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is exactly the purpose of that amendment, and it does that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MANN. That is to strike out the amendment that was inserted and insert this amendment in lieu thereof; practically it has to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WEBB. This is to be adopted in lieu of the amendment the gentleman offered an hour or so ago?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment and adopt it as read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment previously adopted by the committee by inserting the amendment just read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

[Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk report the next bill to be considered under the rule—H. R. 16586.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the first reading of the bill H. R. 16586 is dispensed with, and the Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] as to his idea of proceeding with debate at this time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have yielded all of my time, but none of them are ready to proceed right now.

Mr. MANN. It will be the other side of the House to proceed first.

Mr. ADAMSON. The reason I asked the gentleman the question, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois, is unless I look a little further than the end of my nose we might get tangled up to-night. If there is no speaker to proceed, we would just as well give direction to the session at this time and have an understanding.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman if it would not have the same effect if we would hold a night session and if no speakers are ready to proceed, we will use up three hours of debate in that way?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, if the gentleman from Minnesota is willing to cancel out that much of his time I will put in an hour to-night.

Mr. MANN. I am not referring to the speakers of the gentleman from Minnesota; they would give us real meat.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, it is well that gentlemen should compliment themselves, otherwise they might go without compliments. It is better to wait until the feast is served before discussing the quality of the viands. I will state, Mr. Chairman, if it is the pleasure of the committee to rise at this time I have one speaker who can consume an hour to-night; and if the other side will use an hour, that will enable us to finish general debate on Thursday.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I may be able to find some one this evening; but this is a very important section, and the speakers who will address the House from this side of the House deserve a quorum, because they will discuss the merits of the proposition.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman is going to get lonesome and require the presence of a quorum, he might just as well say so.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I think under the circumstances this evening we shall insist on a quorum.

Mr. ADAMSON. I call attention to the fact that if we consume the entire 10 hours allowed for debate we could not finish general debate on Thursday, unless we consume some time this evening, and I shall move that the committee rise; but I can use an hour to-night, and I hope the gentleman can use enough time so that we can finish the general debate on Thursday.

Mr. MURDOCK. Rise until when?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not suppose that the gentleman from Minnesota apprehends that he will be lonesome in the daytime; it is at night that he fears he will be lonesome.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the rule covers the mode of procedure, and we are willing to abide by the rule. But if the speakers on this side of the House to whom I have yielded time should not be present, I wish to give notice that I shall want to protect those to whom I have yielded time.

Mr. ADAMSON. If gentlemen will return to-night for a short service and tell all the folks that they will hear one good speech, I shall have an hour occupied [laughter]; and I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of the act to regulate commerce and other bills under the special order of the House and had come to no resolution thereon.

REPRINT OF THE CLAYTON ANTITRUST ACT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, or suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] that he ask unanimous consent, to have the antitrust bill that was just laid aside and favorably reported reprinted as it has been amended by the committee.

Mr. WEBB. I make that request, Mr. Speaker. I think it is a good suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent to have a reprint made of the antitrust bill as agreed to in committee. Is there objection? Were any amendments adopted to it?

Mr. MANN. Yes; a number of them; but the reprint should not show that they are amendments. I think the whole thing, being a committee amendment, should be printed as agreed to in the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2860. An act providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal request.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 2, 1914.

To the Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives:

I respectfully ask leave of absence from attendance at the House of Representatives for an indefinite period on account of the meeting of the Japanese-American group of the Interparliamentary Union at Tokyo and the Interparliamentary Union at Stockholm, both of which I desire to attend as a delegate of the American group.

Respectfully,

W. D. B. AINEY.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16966) granting a pension to Joseph E. La Rocque, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the change of reference will be made.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR NIGHT SESSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates Mr. RAKER, of California, to act as Speaker pro tempore to-night.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a couple of conference reports on Senate bills.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 711).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill S. 4168, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 3, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$20"; and the House agree to the same.

J. A. M. ADAIR,
JOE J. RUSSELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

BENJ. F. SHIVELY,
CHARLES F. JOHNSON,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that is no conference report. It says—

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 3, and agree to the same.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The Clerk of the Senate committee prepared the report. It is not from our committee, anyway. It is the wrong report.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman had better not try to pass that to-night.

The SPEAKER. You can not amend a conference report in the House. The only thing to do is to withdraw it.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I will ask to withdraw the conference report, and will have it sent back to the Senate to be fixed up.

RECESS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by Mr. RAKER as Speaker pro tempore.

REGULATION OF RAILWAY STOCKS AND BONDS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will automatically under the rule resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield? I would like to suggest the absence of a quorum in order that the bells might be rung to notify Members that the committee is in session for the discussion of a very important measure to-night.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am surprised that my genial friend from Texas suggests ringing the bell instead of ordering the sheriff to call in the people from the public square as he does at home when he wants them to hear him speak. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I take pleasure in yielding to the distinguished gentleman from Texas the author of the bill [Mr. RAYBURN], who although a young Member is old in wisdom and accomplishment. I yield him such part of the five hours allotted to me as he may see proper to use.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, much has been said in recent years about the proposition of securities of railway corporations. Much has been printed, much has been said in Congress and out of Congress upon this question, and it has reached the stage when national parties have taken cognizance of it and have placed some provisions in their platforms on this question.

Your Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce considered it of enough importance to report the bill that is now under consideration. We had before that committee many distinguished witnesses, men of broad experience in affairs of this kind—the attorneys of railway corporations and the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and men of that character and that type.

I do not believe that there was a man who appeared before the committee who did not recommend in some way that Congress take some steps for the control and the regulation of the issue of stocks and bonds by railway corporations. It is true that some went much further than others; some believed that publicity alone, carried through the proper channels by the Interstate Commerce Commission, would be all that was needed to cure these evils. Others as distinguished and as well known in the country believed that we should not only enact further and greater publicity provisions into law, but that the Congress should go far enough to lodge in somebody—and, of course, it was the general consensus of opinion that it should be lodged in the Interstate Commerce Commission—the power of veto. In other words, that we may have the right to say whether or not under a given state of facts the railroad corporation should have the right to issue stocks and bonds. Along this line we have worked in this bill, both along the publicity line and along the line of giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the veto power over the application for the issue of stocks and bonds by railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

This bill contains three provisions which we deem necessary at this time, or a majority of the committee deem necessary at this time, for the protection of the public in the proposition of railway regulation:

First. Greater publicity in financial transactions of railway corporations.

Second. Making it unlawful for railway corporations to issue stocks and bonds or other evidence of indebtedness except for certain specified purposes, and that they shall not be issued for those specified purposes until previous approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have been had.

Third. That two years after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any person to hold the position of director or officer in more than one railroad which is engaged in interstate commerce and subject to the act to regulate commerce, and provides, further, that it shall be unlawful for any president, vice president, chairman of board of directors, director, or directorates of any such carrier to appropriate, pay, or receive as salary or dividends any money resulting from the sale of stocks and bonds.

Mr. Chairman, some people are going to criticize the form and not the substance of this bill, while others are going to criticize the substance and not the form. Some will say that it is not proper legislation to incorporate in section 20 of the act to regulate commerce. It shall be my purpose in taking up this bill to discuss it under the three subheads enumerated to show that these provisions are proper matter into which to expand section 20. Section 20 of the act to regulate commerce deals almost wholly with the subject of publicity of the actions of common carriers with respect to their dealings with the public. The Hadley Commission, appointed under act of Congress in 1910, and composed of a body of men of high character and established reputation along this line, went into an investigation of railroad securities with the purpose of recommending to Congress some legislation along this line. The report of the Hadley Commission deals wholly with the subject of publicity of securities of common carriers. This I believe brings the bill absolutely as a proper amendment to section 20 of the act to regulate commerce. Section 20 of the act to regulate commerce, which provides that railroad corporations shall make annual reports and such special reports as the Interstate Commerce Commission may direct, and says that the commission shall have at all times access to all accounts, records, and memoranda kept by such carrier, is reenacted. In fact, the whole of section 20 as it now stands is reenacted with the additions in this bill. But this bill goes further and uses the following language, following up that just stated: "Correspondence and other documents and papers, regardless of the dates thereof." In the past much has been covered up in the correspondence and papers of the carriers which could not be made accessible under the old law. Believing that this was a defect, and a vital one, we have added that as part of the existing law. You will also note that the bill provides that this correspondence and these documents and papers shall be accessible to the commission, regardless of the dates thereof. The reason of this language may be made clear by quoting from the statement of Commissioner Clark before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as follows:

> A situation has grown up since our annual report was submitted to Congress and under which the railroads take the position that the provisions of section 20 have no application to any books, records, memoranda, etc., which are older than the effective date of the so-called Hepburn Act. In other words, that under section 20 we can go back through all of these records—except that they have challenged our right to go into the correspondence—to August 28, 1910, but beyond that is a sealed book. If this was so, if the law is permanently so considered, it means that a great deal of the vitality shall have been sapped.

This was in the celebrated Louisville & Nashville case, in which the Interstate Commerce Commission was acting in response to a resolution of the Senate. The case is now held up for final adjudication in the courts, and the commission can do no more until the court has passed on the question, and then can do nothing if the court should hold that it is beyond the power of the commission to look into this matter.

From this statement from a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission you can readily see the absolute necessity for the bill's provision making these papers, documents, correspondence available regardless of their date. In our determination to get full information in regard to the business transactions of the carriers, we did not stop with this, but went much further, as will be seen from the following language used in connection with the power of the commission to employ special agents or examiners who shall have authority, under orders of the commission, to inspect and examine into all such records, documents, accounts, and memoranda, and then we add, "and also the books, papers, correspondence of carriers, construction or other companies, or of firms or individuals, with which a carrier shall have had financial transactions."

We believe this is a proper authority to give the commission, and further believe that it is absolutely a necessary power to give it in order that it may surround itself with all of the facts regarding financial transactions of these railroads in order that they may be able at all times from this great fund of information at hand to deal with all applications of railroads in the matter of rates and regulation otherwise.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the transportation business of the country should be divorced as nearly as possible from all entangling alliances with other business. The Congress in the past has taken some steps along this line, and I believe that the time is ripe when other and further steps should be taken, and I believe that before long you will find coming from your Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce bills to carry out this thought.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said about the power and sufficiency of publicity. Some have spoken of it in a very derogatory manner; others seem to think that in publicity alone may be found the panacea for all of the evils that afflict us. I do not join in the sentiment of the first class at all, nor do I agree in toto with the latter. But I do believe that when the white light of publicity is thrown upon the business transactions and associations of men it will be one of the great factors in causing men to cease doing many of the reprehensible and unwise things that they are now doing. I do not join in the great chorus going up from the pessimists of this country in which they seek to convey the idea that the world is getting worse instead of better, and that men are less amenable to publicity to-day than they were in former times. There is no decent man but that desires to be respected by his fellow man, and when he is engaging in practices that he knows will be condemned by all right-thinking and right-acting people if it were known, I believe that that man will be deterred to a great extent from engaging in these practices. We go further than these provisions just suggested and we say that the Interstate Commerce Commission may in its discretion call upon the railroad companies to make public to their shareholders such information as the commission desires and in such form as the commission may direct. A great wrong has been practiced along this line by those higher up in authority in these carrier corporations by keeping the men who hold the shares of stock, and who are vitally interested in the business of the companies, absolutely in the dark as to the financial transactions in which they have an interest. I believe that when that part of this bill becomes a law it will be a great boon to the small investor in railways in this country. In other words, Mr. Chairman, I believe that it takes this, added to the other provisions requiring publicity in this bill, to round it out and make it what it should be along the lines of publicity. Remembering what was said in the beginning, that section 20 deals with the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to call for facts concerning the financial transactions of railroads, and taking into consideration the amendments to the existing law that I have discussed, I say that I believe this is a proper amendment to section 20 of the act to regulate commerce. And to further justify the position that we have taken upon this publicity proposition in this bill, I quote from section 6 of the recommendation of the Hadley Commission as follows:

> Upon the whole, your commission believes the accurate knowledge of the facts concerning the issues of securities and the expenditures of their proceeds is a matter of utmost importance. It is the one thing on which the Federal Government can effectively insist to-day; it is the fundamental thing which must serve as a basis for whatever additional regulation may be desirable in the future.

I believe in toto in that statement, and I believe that when we have built up this great line of publicity as suggested in this bill, if it alone were put into this bill, it would be a great boon to the country, and its beneficent results would be felt throughout the country, especially among the people who are dealing with the railroads and who are engaged or in any way connected with the securities of railroad corporations.

APPROVAL BEFORE ISSUE.

I now come to the second part of the amendment to section 20, that of the control of the issues of stocks and bonds and other securities of railroads and the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission before any issues of stocks and bonds or other evidences of indebtedness may be made. Much has been said of late years concerning, and much proper criticism has come from the public in regard to, the overissue of stocks and bonds and overcapitalization of railroads, and many abuses along this line have brought us to believe that legislation along this line is absolutely necessary at this time. Commissioner Clements in his testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce substantially says:

> I have believed for a good many years that there ought to be some regulation, at least to the extent of restricting and limiting the power of corporations engaged in interstate commerce to issue stocks and bonds. This condition has been a matter of growth in my own mind and judgment. I have always been rather inclined to the general theory of as little regulation as was necessary as being better than to have any that is superfluous.

Mr. KINDEL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KINDEL. The gentleman having invited us to ask him any questions, I would like to ask if, in the gentleman's opinion, these stocks and bonds have anything to do with the classification of freight rates, express rates, and parcel-post rates?

Mr. RAYBURN. It certainly does, and I am going to come to that; capitalization certainly is a great factor in the determination of freight rates.

Mr. KINDEL. Exactly; I wanted to know how the gentleman bases that as having anything to do with the question of rates.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am coming to that, and I think I can demonstrate easily to every one to whom it is possible to demonstrate anything that the proposition of the capitalization of a railroad is not the all-determining factor in making rates and promulgating tariffs, but it is one of the great determining features in it.

Mr. KINDEL. The same authorities the gentleman just quoted—Clark and Clements—are the ones who have established the express rates, and these same authorities are responsible for the parcel-post rates, which are 200 per cent higher than the express rates in our section of the country——

Mr. RAYBURN. If the Interstate Commerce Commission has made a mistake——

Mr. KINDEL. A mistake?

Mr. RAYBURN (continuing). I am not standing for them; I am not an apologist for them along any line.

Mr. KINDEL. I want to arrive at the benefit we are going to receive from this.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman will come to that in a moment.

Mr. RAYBURN. I desire to say I will endeavor to answer any pertinent question, but the proposition of the parcel-post rates is not a pertinent question to this proposition.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion from his colleague——

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would ask if it is not a pertinent place to remind all anxious inquirers that the control of the overissne of stocks and bonds might prevent speculators and wreckers from rendering the carriers unable to discharge their duties at all? [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. That is exactly what we are driving at in this bill; that is, to have a house cleaning among the railroads of this country that they may not overload themselves with unnecessary and spurious securities that will incapacitate them from performing their functions as public carriers in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. KINDEL. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KINDEL. If it is true that we ought to have a house cleaning, get rid of things, had we not better start at the Post Office Department?

Mr. RAYBURN. My dear sir, there are lots of things down at the Post Office Department that I would like to clean out, but I am not going to put them in this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. KINDEL. I want to see whether the Interstate Commerce Commission in the same breath will make a rate 200 per cent higher than for the express.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. I always yield cheerfully to the chairman.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest to the gentleman that, in view of the laborious character of the work of our committee, it is wise to postpone, until after we dispose of pressing affairs, the Post Office affairs, the study of astronomy, and the jurisdiction of all other committees. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAYBURN. That has been the purpose of our committee. That is the reason why we work so harmoniously among ourselves, and that is the reason why we work so harmoniously in the House. We seek to attend to the matters that properly come before that committee, and do not invade the jurisdiction of other committees of this House.

Now, continuing, Commissioner Clements said:

> But experience and observation have convinced me that there should be some regulation at the base as well as at the top of this matter of common-carrier organization and operation.

You will see from this statement—and I believe that it is concurred in by a majority of the Interstate Commerce Commission—that they believe some steps along the line of Federal control of the issues of securities engaged in interstate commerce is absolutely necessary and imperative; and being in harmony with this law, your committee has added another paragraph to section 20 to regulate commerce, which says that it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to issue any capital stock or certificate of stock of any bond or other evidence of indebtedness or assume any other obligation or become the lessor of any other railroad——

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; but let me get to a period always.

Mr. ANDERSON. Finish the sentence.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is several lines long.

Mr. ANDERSON. I merely wanted to ask the gentleman whether that section referred to new stock issues or would permit the refunding of outstanding obligations?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am just coming to that—what we consider as necessary purposes. It shall be unlawful for any common carrier to become the lessor of any other railroad, or the guarantor or surety for the securities of any other person, natural or artificial, even though permitted by the authority creating the carrier corporation, except for some purpose necessary to the proper performance of its service for the public and not tending to impair the financial ability of the carrier to discharge its duty to the public, and goes on to say that extensions and improvements of its railroads and terminals in connection therewith, increasing and improving the equipment, refunding and retiring existing bonds, and similar and kindred purposes, shall be held to be necessary purposes in the meaning of this law.

Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it does.

Mr. RAYBURN. Then we say that it shall be unlawful for any railroad corporation to issue any such stocks and bonds hereinbefore mentioned or for any purpose connected with or relating to that part of the business of the carrier covered by the act to regulate commerce unless and until the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have approved the purposes of the issue and the proceeds thereof. Then we add another provision, which we believe is wise under all of the circumstances, which says that the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to notes issued by a carrier maturing not more than two years from the dates thereof.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BARTON. Are we to understand from that statement that if a company wanted to issue stocks or bonds they would have to lay that proposition before the commission before they could fix upon the number of bonds?

Mr. RAYBURN. No. As I understand railroad operations, those in charge meet and authorize an issue of stock and bonds. Of course they go upon the market when that is done, and they sell them. Under this provision, when they meet and approve an issue of stock or bonds, before they can finally issue them they must come before the Interstate Commerce Commission and show the reason for the issue, and also lay before the Interstate Commerce Commission all the facts as to what they intend to do with the proceeds thereof, and so forth.

Mr. BARTON. They are required to make a showing as to what they will do with the proceeds?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. They must show the Interstate Commerce Commission that it is for a necessary purpose, and the necessary purpose is contained in one of the enumerated provisions that I have just read.

By the unbridled and unregulated system in the past of the railroads of the country loading themselves down with unnecessary and inappropriate issues of stocks and bonds I believe that the railroad companies have placed themselves in a position where they have not been able to perform their duties to the public. I do not say that capitalization is the all-controlling factor in the making of rates, but I do say that it is one of the great determining factors in making and promulgating railroad tariffs. When a railroad company is allowed to unnecessarily load itself down with spurious securities of one kind and another every thoughtful man will agree that the ability of the carrier to perform its functions is impaired. The present deplorable condition of the railroads of this country is but an echo of bad management upon the part of the railway officials.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS. On what ground does your committee exempt the issuance of two-year notes?

Mr. RAYBURN. The first provision in this bill, until it was finally thrashed out by the committee, when I first drew it, provided that they might issue stock and securities running for one year without having the previous permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The committee took it up, and after much consideration we decided that two years would probably be better. We thought that for little running expenses and matters like that it was not necessary for a railroad company, in order to do right by the public, to come before the Interstate Commerce Commission and wait for their approval of a bond issue, or an issue of any kind of securities running a short time, in order that they could better carry on their business.

Mr. ADAMSON. Right there, will the gentleman explain under that provision——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. That these current notes ought to be limited to a small proportion of the outstanding liabilities?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and these notes and securities for the issuance of which they do not have to have the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission before they are issued can never at any time exceed 5 per cent of the existing stock and bonds of the railroad company.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Under the provisions of your bill would it be permissible for one railroad to buy the stock of a connecting line so as to get control thereof? For instance, could a railroad running east of Kansas City buy stocks from a railroad running beyond Kansas City in order to get control of it?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think it would be prohibited by the bill.

As I just said a moment ago, they can issue stocks and bonds for that purpose, and, of course, it is presumed that they could buy and extend their lines, because that is construed in this bill as one of the necessary purposes for the extension and improvement of the line.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not mean the buying of the line itself, but control of the stock.

Mr. SIMS. There would be no difference between getting it in one way or the other.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it would be permissible. They are before the Interstate Commerce Commission at this very hour clamoring for a 5 per cent increase in freight rates all over the country, and they are very able, considering their spurious securities, to make such a showing that under the present rates allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission it amounts to almost confiscation. I do not presume to speak for the Interstate Commerce Commission, nor do I know what they are going to do with the pending application of the railroads for this increase, but I do venture this assertion, that if the Interstate Commerce Commission, after a full, fair hearing and complete investigation, finds that it is their duty to grant this increase in the rates it will be almost wholly on account of the railroads in the past being able to do an almost unbridled wildcat business in overloading themselves with spurious and unnecessary obligations. I believe that this is a vicious habit, and has already been condemned by every thoughtful and patriotic man, and one that ought to be stopped, and stopped now. Nobody will deny that in many instances the railroad companies of the country are in a bad shape financially, and that their ability to perform their functions and to fulfill their obligations to the public are impaired to the fullest and most ridiculous extent. I believe that this bill when enacted it to a law will have the effect of a house cleaning among railroad corporations of the country and, under the administration of this beneficent provision, that the railroads of the country will not again be found in the condition in which they are to-day.

In this bill we provide against any railroad becoming the lessor of another railroad or the guarantor or surety for the security of any other corporation.

Mr. QUIN. Will the provisions of this bill prevent the railroad corporations from being looted and plundered, like the New York, New Haven & Hartford?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is exactly one of the things we are driving at. If there had been absolute publicity in all the transactions of the railroad in new issues of stocks and bonds and other securities; if they had been compelled to come before the Interstate Commerce Commission and lay down before them the reasons upon which they made their application, and if these issues had been required to be approved before it would have been possible for the railroad company to have made the issue, we do not believe it could have been done.

Mr. BAILEY. Assuming that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall grant this 5 per cent increase in rates, is it not reasonably certain that the railroad companies will capitalize on that increased earning power? That is what they have done heretofore.

Mr. RAYBURN. We are having a revaluation of the railroads now.

Mr. BAILEY. Is there anything in this bill to prevent their recapitalizing on that increased earning power?

Mr. RAYBURN. I can not conceive that they will capitalize that increase.

Mr. BAILEY. They have always done it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think they will do that under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. CANTOR. That can not be done except with the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission, anyhow.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; and I do not think it will be done under this bill.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY] that they could not increase their loans or bonds to any extent without first filing a petition with the Interstate Commerce Commission, specifying for what the expenditure shall be made; and if the petition is granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the bonds and stocks are sold, they must report to the commission the disposition of the proceeds of the sale, so that the commission will know that the purpose for which the loan was made has been accomplished. That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Will this bill prevent an increase of capitalization?

Mr. CULLOP. The Interstate Commerce Commission must first grant the permission, and it has the right to refuse it.

Mr. BAILEY. They will have increased earning power.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], the author of this bill, if this bill will not, in his opinion, if enacted into law, prevent all future issues of stocks and bonds to be paid for in water or wind?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is one of the purposes of the bill, and that is our intention in presenting the bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas this question: In case a railroad company should make a good showing to the Interstate Commerce Commission, would the Interstate Commerce Commission under this bill have the arbitrary right to absolutely refuse to permit them to issue bonds?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that would be a question that they could take into the courts if it was for an absolutely necessary purpose. I do not think the Interstate Commerce Commission could arbitrarily put up their decision as final. It would be like the question of rates. The railroad companies have the right to appeal to the courts, and I think they would have a right to appeal from this decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not one of the main purposes of this bill to give stability and value to railroad stocks and bonds for the protection of the men and women who invest their money in these stocks and bonds in good faith, so that the rate to be charged by the railroads is not the only material fact in the bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is not; but the gentleman's question answers itself and answers it much better than I can, and I thank him for it.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is one of the most salient provisions in this bill. Many times railroad companies themselves do a great business, the proceeds of which would be sufficient to make the property a paying investment, but by becoming the lessor of unprofitable railroads, or by becoming the guarantor or surety of some other corporation, are themselves milked of all of the proceeds of this paying corporation, and it redounds to the great detriment of the small stockholder in the parent company. To my mind this is one of the vicious practices, and one that long ago should have been prohibited by law. Under this law when a railroad company comes before the Interstate Commerce Commission asking the right to make an issue of stocks and bonds they must prove absolutely to that commission, first, that this issue is for a necessary purpose; and, second, they are compelled by the commission to make known the purposes for which the proceeds of this issue are to be applied, following up the first amendment to section 20 on publicity.

Many people doubt the power of Congress along this line. I for one do not. I believe that Congress has the power under the Constitution to enter this field, for under the commerce clause of the Constitution the Federal Government has the power of the regulation of interstate commerce, and following that we are brought to the necessity of concluding that Congress has the power over all matters that affect the carrier in trying to carry out its contracts with the public to do an interstate business. There is no proposition better settled in law than that when the Federal Government has the right to enter a field of legislation, and does enter that field, it then occupies it exclusively.

Many people have spoken to me and said that the celebrated case of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad against Kentucky was a case in point to prove that the Interstate Commerce Commission did not have the power and authority to enter this field. Now, I want to quote from that case the most salient provision and the one bearing upon this point which these gentlemen pin their faith to—that this will be an unconstitutional bill on account of the Interstate Commerce Commission not having this power which it is sought to be conferred by Congress:

> It is plain that the provision in question does not in terms embrace the case of interstate traffic. It is restricted in its regulation to those who own or operate a railroad within the State, and the long and short distances mentioned are evidently distances upon the railroad line within the State. The particular case before us is one involving only the transportation of coal from one point in the State of Kentucky to another by a corporation of that State. It may be that the enforcement of the State regulation forbidding discrimination in rates in the case of articles of a like kind carried for different distances over the same line may somewhat affect commerce generally; but we have frequently held that such a result is too remote and indirect to be regarded as an interference with interstate commerce; that the interference with the commercial power of the General Government to be unlawful must be direct, and not the merely incidental effect of enforcing the police powers of a State. (183 U. S., pp. 518, 519.)

That is the provision upon which several gentlemen hinge their faith that Congress does not have the power to enter this field. That proposition does not touch the one concerning the power of Congress to regulate interstate-commerce transactions or interstate-commerce business. It simply says that when products or commodities are shipped from one part of the State to another it does not come within the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, and that it does not affect its ability to do interstate commerce; and if it does affect it in any way, it is too remote for the court to take cognizance of it as an interstate transaction.

Now, I want to read a brief extract from another opinion, an opinion by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of McCollough against Maryland, as follows:

> While our Government must be acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers, the Constitution does not attempt to set forth all means by which such powers may be carried into execution. It leaves Congress large discretion as to the means that may be employed in executing a given power. The sound construction of the Constitution, this court has said, "must allow to the National Legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."

That same thought, in slightly different phrase, has been repeated by the Supreme Court of the United States as late as Two hundred and nineteenth United States. I read a brief extract from its opinion in the case of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad v. Riverside Mills (219 U. S., 203), as follows:

> Having the express power to make rules for the conduct of commerce among the States, the range of congressional discretion as to the regulation best adapted to remedy a practice found inefficient or hurtful is a wide one. If the regulating act be one directly applicable to such commerce, not obnoxious to any other provision of the Constitution, and reasonably adapted to the purpose and the rule provided, the question of power is foreclosed.

I believe that under that ruling of Chief Justice Marshall, not dissented from, and brought down through an unbroken line of decisions in our Federal courts, it is absolutely certain that Congress has the power to enter this field of legislation, and the question of the constitutionality of this act is foreclosed.

We all know that capitalization, as said before, is one of the determining factors in the making of rates, and is also brought in evidence in the rate hearings; and I believe that the Government has the right to say whether or not this evidence shall be fictitious. Knowing that the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to have full information regarding any carrier making application to it for approval of any issue of stocks and bonds,

I believe that this provision with reference to stocks and bonds is a proper amendment to section 20 to regulate commerce, for in the sixth and last recommendation of the Hadley Commission it is said substantially that the commission shall have full and accurate knowledge concerning the securities of railroad companies as a basis for further legislation on the question; and this is further legislation on the question. It, therefore, would seem silly to me for a man to say that this is not a proper amendment to section 20 of the act to regulate commerce.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman has stated that stock and bond issues have much to do with the fixing of the rates. In the last Congress we passed a bill authorizing and directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a physical valuation of the property of the railroads. I understood at that time, and many of us believed, that the physical valuation should be the basis of rate making. This bill authorizes the commission to O. K. a stock and bond issue. The question in my mind is this: If the commission O. K's a stock and bond issue, as a practical proposition, will it not be obliged to permit the railroad company to earn a reasonable dividend on those stocks and bonds and thus practically nullify the value of the physical valuation?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think so, because I believe that we are finally coming to the proposition in this country that rates will be almost wholly fixed upon value, but I believe that at the present time—and I believe it will run on—the capitalization proposition will be taken to a great extent as value, and will be brought as it is now by attorneys of railway corporations into hearings on this question.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The bill itself provides that the Government shall not be bound by this approval of stock and bond issues.

Mr. ANDERSON. I understand the bill provides the Government shall not guarantee the revenue or dividend on any stocks or bonds which the commission may O. K., but as a practical proposition, when the commission has said to the railway companies, "You may issue bonds and stocks to a certain amount," it practically finds that there is a value somewhere which warrants the issue of those stocks and bonds, but in substance it says to the investor that the Government will permit the railway company to make a reasonable dividend on the stocks and bonds which it authorizes to be issued. I do not see any escape from that proposition.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] would only apply in case of a noncompeting line? For example, there are three main lines extending from Chicago to St. Louis—the Illinois Central, the Chicago & Alton, and the Wabash. One of those might be capitalized for twice as much as the other and yet the rates would of necessity be the same. Therefore the physical valuation would cut no figure, in my judgment.

INTERLOCKING DIRECTORATES.

Mr. RAYBURN. The third and last of the former enumerated provisions of this bill provides, substantially, that two years from the passage of this act no person shall be an officer or director in more than one corporation subject to the act to regulate commerce, unless it has the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the interlocking of directorates of great corporations of this country has been one of the greatest of the evil tendencies of the times. [Applause.] We have instances on record where one man will be president of many corporations. In some of them he will have a small amount of stock; others in which he will have, in many instances, a controlling interest in the corporation. These corporations buy from and sell to each other. It is as natural for a man who controls these corporations to work for the interest of the one in which he has the greatest pecuniary interest as it is for water to flow downhill.

Coming to the question directly under consideration, do you believe that it is safe to the country and its institutions for one man to be president or to sit upon the board of many railway corporations? The same doctrine just announced in regard to other corporations in general will apply in equal force with regard to railroads. It may be said by some that it is sufficient to say that the interlocking of directorates of competing corporations shall be stopped. But do you know that one of the hardest problems to solve with reference to any business is whether or not railroads are really competing lines?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. In that section I notice an exception is made that after two years they can not hold a directorship in two or more railroads unless previous approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have been secured. Why is that exception put in there?

Mr. RAYBURN. We thought that in many instances of small railroads an injustice might be done, not only to the directors and stockholders themselves but that a great injustice might be done to the public, for the simple reason that in some of these smaller institutions, not alone railroads but other corporations, we find in some communities it is absolutely necessary for one set of men to practically control all of the small corporations in that town. Take a small town and let a few men there organize a bank. Perhaps there will be half a dozen men in the town who are able to organize the bank. After a while they will want to build a flouring mill, or they will want, in the South, to build a cotton mill, or they will want to build a cotton press, or they will want to build a cottonseed-oil mill, and if you prevent the interlocking directorates in those things absolutely and totally and leave no discretion in anybody, in many instances, we think, you are likely to do a serious injustice not only to the men who own stock in the corporation but you do an injustice to the public in impairing the ability of the corporation to perform its functions and duty to the public.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman recall that he himself raised the point before the committee, which, I think, answers the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], that most of these railroads, especially the larger systems, are made up of subsidiaries and of several smaller lines, and some of the larger ones, especially in the West and the Southwest, are composed of railroad lines which are compelled to be incorporated anew in each State through which the carrier runs, and for that reason it was necessary, in those cases, that the officers of the parent line should also be the officers of the subsidiary line?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is exactly it—made absolutely necessary, I think.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] struck the thought I had in mind. I was going to suggest a concrete instance to the gentleman in answer to the gentleman from Mississippi that there are many systems of railroads which have grown up by putting together roads which are practically extensions of one another. There are several lines running from this city and Norfolk to the Mississippi River, each made up of roads originally chartered within certain States. All of those lines are now operated by one company, forming one continuous line, and they have maintained the old autonomy, and each old company still has its board of directors. We thought on representation in cases like that the Interstate Commerce Commission might properly, without injury to the public or any private interest, permit the same directors to operate the entire line and all its parts.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RAKER. Is there any State in the Union that would prohibit a railroad being built into and through the State? If it should organize its corporation, for instance, in Indiana and start west across the various States, are there any of those States that would prohibit these corporations from continuing the main line on through that State without organizing a new railroad company in each State for the purpose of connecting at the State line? Is there any case of that kind?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will answer yes.

Mr. RAKER. Where?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co. was compelled by State laws to incorporate in five different States. After having incorporated in one State with the right specifically in the articles of incorporation where they were going to build on through various States, the States they built in prohibited them from doing it without reincorporating in that State.

Mr. RAKER. I doubted that, but I am not going to doubt the gentleman, because he has had experience in the matter and I have not especially looked it up, but my observation of these matters is that most of these new corporations are formed and organized in the States for the purpose of getting bonuses from the citizen—the counties—where they go, whereas the main line is continued on through and they could not get it, and therefore they have a new incorporation and get these large bonuses, and then the company gets the road built and turns it over to the main corporation.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is possible. Of course there are not many States that will refuse, and it usually ends in the railroad company getting the line through.

Mr. ADAMSON. If my friend will kindly yield again.

Mr. RAYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. In proposing this legislation in the nature of a new departure, was not the prime purpose in making this exception to provide for existing conditions rather than to encourage future consolidation?

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, yes.

Railroads are not compelled to be parallel in order to be competing lines. Of course, you may say that this is lodging great power and discretion in the Interstate Commerce Commission. That I admit; but we feared that to say unconditionally that under no circumstances could one person be a director in two railroads a serious injustice might result. There may be conditions and circumstances under which it would not be to the detriment of the public, and in which it may be to the interest of the public in inconsequential instances for a man to sit as a director in two railroad corporations. Admitting that this is a great power and discretion to lodge in the Interstate Commerce Commission, we must remember that the Interstate Commerce Commission is a great body, made up of high-class, honorable men who represent the Government, and when representing the Government they represent the people, and I will say for the Interstate Commerce Commission, although they need no defender, there has been as little criticism of the personnel or the acts of that great body as of any department of this Government. Believing that there has been another great abuse, and that great crimes were committed by officers of railroad companies, we have provided another thing in this bill, and that is that it shall hereinafter be unlawful for any president, vice president, chairman of board of directors, director, or directory of any carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce, to appropriate, pay, or receive as salaries or dividends any money resulting from the sale of stocks and bonds. I believe that the proceeds of these stocks and bonds should be applied and used for the purposes set out in the application to the commission, and that is to go for some necessary purpose that will help the carrier and increase its ability to perform its obligations to the public.

Thus I have gone over in a meager way the provisions of this bill. I do not expect that it shall escape critcism, nor do I claim that it does not contain defects and imperfections. No human instrumentality is capable of escaping this penalty. Some have said that the penalties prescribed in this bill are too drastic. Some have criticized one thing about this bill; some another.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that guilt is personal. The single remedy of fining a corporation and allowing the individual malefactors to go free has not come up to the expectations of its most enthusiastic advocates. When you assess a great fine against a corporation, one of two things must necessarily result. It must increase the price of its products or its service, or else its ability to perform its rightful functions must be impaired by this drain on its treasury, and dividends must be cut down. The innocent shareholder of these great corporations must then suffer as much as the criminal shareholder.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is no adequate way for punishment, merely. I believe that guilt is personal, and I believe that punishment should be personal; hence the provisions of this bill, which says that a violation of the express provisions of this bill by the individual responsible for the violation should be held absolutely responsible; hence we have provided that those who violate the provisions of this law shall be fined or imprisoned for a term of not less than one nor more than three years, or both such fine and imprisonment. [Applause.] I believe that when a man makes a contract he should with scrupulous fidelity live up to it. [Applause.] I believe further that when an individual or a corporation or the individuals of a corporation make a contract with the Government for the performance of a specific duty those men should be forced with the same scrupulous fidelity to live up to that contract with the Government.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation carries out the ideas in the way of national legislation adopted in the State of Texas years ago under the leadership of that great commoner, James Stephen Hogg, and advocated in State and Nation by Texas's grand old man, John H. Reagan. I believe that the provisions of this bill are salient and will redound to a great good and benefit to the people if it is enacted into a law. I believe that when the trust program of this administration becomes the law of the land and when business has had time to adjust itself to the changed conditions—when the law is made definite and understandable—we may with fond anticipation look to a brighter day in this country and to a season of prosperity the land over. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party is not the enemy of capital or of big business. We know that there must be large aggregations of capital to carry on the great and growing business of the country; hence we would be more than foolish to do anything that would hinder or retard the growth of the country. [Applause.] We intend to do simple justice to business, and, on the other hand, we are determined that business shall deal justly with the people. No honest man will ask more, and no man, be he honest or otherwise, may expect less. [Loud applause.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman from Georgia used?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour and ten minutts.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I realize full well that it would be well worth our while to listen for a much longer time to the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. RAYBURN], and in expressing my own appreciation of what he has said I wish to call the attention of those present to what just occurs to me. The State which he represents is the one which gave to all States right direction in railroad legislation when the railroad commission of the State of Texas was headed by a gentleman who once sat in this body, Mr. Reagan, who did so much for this country in railroad legislation. [Applause.]

And it was eminently fitting that the gentleman who just spoke should be the one to direct the way for us at this time. I desire to speak more particularly on another branch of the subject relating to transportation after complying with the rule by offering a few remarks on the bill before us; but the chairman of the committee [Mr. ADAMSON] has served notice on us that we were not to discuss "post-office affairs or astronomy or the business of other committees," if I quote him correctly; and for that reason——

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, he misunderstood me. I was calling attention to the etiquette observed by our committee; that we framed bills according to our jurisdiction, without soaring to the stars or trenching upon the jurisdiction of other committees. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman has very properly done so in the light of our experience in the past, as we can all testify, and I shall only speak briefly in accordance with a suggestion that came to me when I was asked if I cared to discuss the particulars of the bill itself. What I shall say does not relate directly to the particulars of the bill, but the pending bill is one, I think, of great value, and I do not think there will be any disposition to criticize it very severely on either side, by either party in the House. A thought has come to me to-night, after reading the bill and listening to the splendid analysis of it by the gentleman who has just spoken, that only 10 years ago it would have been looked upon as socialistic and impossible—the passage of a bill of this character.

Less than a dozen years ago organized attempts were made by pioneer States in railway legislation toward securing laws to regulate these common carriers. New Haven scandals, Alton bubbles, and a long list of speculative railway kiting ventures existed on every hand. The only difference between conditions then and now lay in the fact that graft and high financiering by "captains" of the railway world, as we called them, were kept secret then, through the time-honored custom of addition, division and silence, a custom that might be abolished with profit to the country in all fields of interstate business. To-day we train the searchlight of publicity upon big business, including railways, and experience has demonstrated it is easy to direct the rays of the machine.

THE POWERFUL LOBBYIST HAS DISAPPEARED.

Mr. Chairman, when restrictive legislation was proposed throughout the country, the State capitols were besieged by lobbyists, railway presidents, attorneys, stockholders, and other protestants, even down to conductors' and brakemen's organizations. The same master mind directed the fight against the laws and the same hand pulled all the strings. Hundreds of shippers thronged the corridors of the capitol of my own State, mingling with the railway lobbyists, cheering the public utterances of opponents to railway legislation, yet whispering words of encouragement to us in secret. That is the history of every fight for railway control waged in other States, and it is the history of the fight for Federal control. Only a few years ago the corridors of this Capitol were thronged throughout every session with the opponents of important railway legislation, and the railway power extended beyond the corridors to the floors of Congress.

The bill before us is most "paternalistic" in character, to use an old, familiar term, more drastic in its provisions and more far-reaching than the wildest dreams of railway magnates of a decade ago. It determines the justification for the issuance of stocks, bonds, and other evidences of railway indebtedness, the amount that shall be authorized, the purposes of issuance, while one provision of section 20 authorizes the commission to inquire into every business transaction of any railway company and to give full publicity to its discoveries. Personal guilt of officers and directors for refusal to furnish correct information, supported by fines or imprisonment, assure the law's observance.

All these features are covered by the bill, and yet not one lobbyist nor railway official nor shipper is in evidence in the corridors to-day, nor is any pronounced protest urged against this legislation, because in the short space of 10 years we have learned that the business of the common carrier is the people's business, and that those who pay the freight shall have a voice in determining the business methods of their authorized agents. Certainly the world moves and Congress has compelled honest and open business dealings on the part of others, a policy that recommends itself to a wide field of public service.

THE REAL SUFFERERS FROM RAILWAY MISMANAGEMENT.

I speak of that in order to show the progress we have made in legislation and to show how far we have gone, and yet practically we have not realized it. One important phase of this bill which impresses me is that indicated by the suggestion of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL], a point that is pertinent here, I believe, and that is as to parties in interest who are dealing with the railroad companies. It is important to know that stocks shall have a fixed value. Less than a week ago a widow came to me and spoke of stock that she had in the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., which when given to her was worth 250 per cent, but which is to-day worth, as she said, 68 per cent; and she added, "What am I to do?" That was practically all that she had for her support. It was not the railroad officials who suffered, nor the directors; but a poor widow. And I know the situation is just as I have pictured it, and just as she told me. But you avoid a repetition of that by this bill, not only through the provision which requires the board or commission itself to pass upon these securities, but from the light of publicity that is brought to bear.

There is another thing that occurs to me in connection with this bill and similar legislation, although it does not directly refer to what is contained in the bill. One of the most important suggestions that come from the New Haven investigation and similar investigations which we have had throughout the country is, in my judgment, that the officials who have been examined state it as their desire that the Government itself should take over these great corporations which are now doing business in the country. And why? That would have been impossible for consideration 10 years ago. But the spirit of speculation is being taken out of these propositions by reason of this very legislation that we have been having in recent years. It is bringing the railways up to strict business standards, and that is the reason why many men feel there is nothing to be gained by this system of speculating as evidenced in the New Haven Railway, when some one must bear the punishment eventually.

I notice one or two smiles, but let me say this: Ten years ago we never expected legislation of the kind we have to-day. Ten years from now it may not be thought possible to have railroads controlled or owned by the Government. But 50 years from now—and governments live for centuries—50 years from now it may be possible, and it may be the disposition of this Government at that time; and if so, legislation of this character, which seeks to determine that honest business methods shall be observed by the different companies, will be of extreme value in aiding the Government to a determination of what shall be paid for the roads.

I have a hobby, as many Members have. Mine is not like that of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL], and I see him looking at me with interest. We all recognize his. Mine has been born of recent experience, but in the pursuit of that hobby it seems to me that a barrel has been found of wasted money. I am impressed with the fact that the 1914 appropriation embodied in the bill that passed for rivers and harbors—that is, money appropriated and money pledged for expenditure in the future—would have been sufficient to build a transcontinental railway from New York to San Francisco. The money that has been expended for the Panama Canal would build 15,000 miles of railway. That depends, of course, upon the valuation per mile, but that is at over $25,000 per mile. So it is entirely within the range of possibility that within a few years we shall be enabled to undertake as a business proposition an investment in these roads, and we will be aided by this legislation.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Before the gentleman leaves the question of the cost of construction of railroads, has this ever come to his attention—I think it came before our committee at one time—that the cost of constructing a line from Chicago to New York would not equal the amount that it would cost to construct a line from the Harlem River down to the Grand Central Station, in New York City.

Mr. FREAR. I presume that has been found true, Mr. Chairman, and I realize that in England, if that is to be considered, railways cost hundreds of thousands of dollars per mile, but in my own State a road which was constructed at $16,000 a mile is now capitalized at something like $60,000 a mile, and very little actual money has gone into the business since its construction.

But of course it is a question here of fictitious value, as was so well explained by the gentleman who last addressed us [Mr. RAYBURN], and that is what this bill seeks—to drive the water out of business and put it upon an honest and sound basis, as he said; and that seems to me to be one of the important things in which the Government as well as the individual is interested. [Applause.]

I now desire to present a few observations that have not a direct bearing upon the bill, but which are of vital interest to the people of the country.

THE INSIDE OF THE PORK BARREL.

Mr. Chairman, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 28 appears an extended article on the 1914 "pork-barrel" bill, so denominated by the author of the article, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. This article, originally appearing in the Saturday Evening Post, is courteously placed in the RECORD by Senator RANSDELL of Louisiana. By anyone familiar with the subject it will be found to be a clever presentation by an able lawyer of a bad and indefensible cause enveloped in glittering generalities. Written to forestall public opinion, which is becoming aroused over the most vicious pork barrel ever foisted on the country, it is ushered into notice at the right moment through one of the greatest publishing agencies in the world—the Saturday Evening Post. A casual reading discloses the article has also been written for the purpose of placating a leading Senator, whose powerful influence against the bill is feared by its supporters, and significantly also the Post article appears while the bill is before the Senate committee. It apparently seeks to counteract injurious reports from the other end of the Capitol that the 1914 bill is to be loaded down with many additional objectionable and indefensible items, and it attempts to forestall well-merited criticism by light airy generalities and ridicule.

A careful perusal of the Post article, copied in last Thursday's RECORD, is urged upon every Member in order that the pitiable weakness of argument put forth by the pork barrel's foremost champion in the House may be digested. My own ineffective opposition to the bill is entirely impersonal and taken because of the many vicious projects contained in it. For unimpeachable testimony on this score I quote from the RECORD of March 26, also found on page 7079 of the RECORD of April 10, the following:

> During the past several days the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has moved to strike out numerous items contained in the bill. I do not say now and have not heretofore said and shall not hereafter say anything in criticism of him for that. I am perfectly satisfied that he did it because he believed by so doing he was serving his country well. It is just a difference of opinion.

ELOQUENT FIGURES CONCERNING THE PORK BARREL.

This kindly sentiment came from the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, the author of the Saturday Evening Post article, a gentleman for whose abilities and estimable personal qualities I have profound respect. In the RECORD of April 10 I collated facts presented to the House by myself during the five days' discussion under the five-minute rule. In that statement I showed river and harbor appropriations had grown from about $187,000,000 for the 20 years from 1875 to 1894, when river commerce was at its height, to $184,424,918 for the 10-year period from 1895 to 1904, or 100 per cent average increase per annum. Also that the notorious pork barrel now reaches $184,345,034 for the four years from 1911 to 1914, inclusive, although the last figures may amount to $200,000,000 before the present bill returns from the Senate. Further, that in addition to a 500 per cent increase in the size of the pork barrel within the period mentioned, the Government is obligated to an amount of $205,000,000 additional for continuing projects proposed in recent years; yet, notwithstanding all this enormous expenditure of over a half billion dollars and an additional debt of $300,000,000, our river commerce on the Mississippi, Missouri, and practically every other river, with one exception, has decreased over 80 per cent, and it has materially decreased on all rivers. This statement there made was supported by official Government statistics as to the appropriations and traffic. It is not denied in the Post article. It can not be successfully denied.

During that discussion, I gave official statements from Army engineers showing that the 1914 pork barrel contained river projects some of which were dry for eight months in the year, others for scarcely less periods. One of these had a depth of 1 inch at the head of navigation after an expenditure of $32,000. Others were improvements for the exclusive use of private factories for private purposes. Others were real-estate projects, reaching in one case to three-quarters of a million dollars. Others were for projects that are now costing the Government $100 for every ton of freight shipped by water. Others, like the Coosa River project, referred to in the Post article, are to cost millions of dollars and will be valueless. To be more specific, the Coosa has been "improved" for 24 years. Its cost is estimated by Army engineers at $6,059,913. At the present rate of improvement it will take over 100 years to finish, and after many years of wasted time and money the engineer reports: "As yet—after 19 years—no benefit has been derived from this improvement, and its value is entirely dependent on the completion of the entire system." The Coosa River project is a grim joke on the people, and yet it is the one project especially mentioned with approval in the Post article. Where is the unnavigable Coosa River for which $6,059,913 is to be appropriated? How many Members of the House or taxpayers of the country know the whereabouts of this undiscovered stream?

THE SHAMEFUL BILL IS EXCUSED, NOT DEFENDED.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to repeat arguments urged upon the House, but I do say that the 1914 pork barrel is filled with many wasteful, vicious projects, only a few of which I attempted to point out. That notwithstanding the 1914 bill is the worst bill ever foisted on the American people, according to the opinion of experts whose opinions are of value, not one item could be stricken out in the House for fear of its supporters that the barrel would fall to pieces if a stave were pulled off. Not one of the facts supported by engineer's reports have been denied or explained in the Post article. Legislation which brings the blush of shame to men who are honest but helpless because of powerful influences behind the barrel, is palliated and excused, but not defended in the Post article. The bill can not be defended. Its only salvation lies in silence as to vicious provisions and it makes an unparalleled plea for more Federal money with which to improve a lost river traffic for boats which no longer run the river.

These facts have been presented to the House together with unimpeachable statistical testimony that the bad outweighs the good in the 1914 pork-barrel bill. At the same time the facts were laid before the editors of the Saturday Evening Post with the hope that a great magazine might be induced to raise its voice in the people's cause. On the contrary, it has become the vehicle for an attempt to justify the worst pork barrel ever presented to the American people. I did not feel permitted to question the Post's position or the article before its insertion in the RECORD, but to remain silent now, when a misleading message is sent approvingly by Government agency throughout the country, is to stultify one's self. The people will some day know about the pork barrel. All the golden gags distributed throughout the land can not much longer keep the barrel afloat. It is loaded down with so many wasteful, dead-weight projects that it is about due to sink.

The Post article justifies the intracoastal canal folly, glosses over appropriations poured into scores of unknown creeks and rivulets to satisfy hungry constituencies with small slices of local graft; it approves the purchase of bankrupt, worthless canals; it declares the Trinity, Brazos, and other engineering failures, as evidenced by Government reports, are worthy ventures; it ignores the millions of dollars carried along in dribbling appropriations that make the whole river-improvement scheme a farce and absurdity; it ignores the startling statement of Chairman SPARKMAN that waterway ventures demanding billions of dollars are knocking at the doors of Congress, backed by men of "national repute"; and it seeks to avoid a discussion of the real facts surrounding the pork barrel by airily boosting the Coosa River project, one of the worst in the bill, and praising other projects that are supposed to bring senatorial influence dependent upon their incorporation in the 1914 bill.

Mr. Chairman, I will not take up the Trinity, Brazos, and other visionary projects which are wicked and wasteful items beyond belief, but are wittily glossed over by the buoyant article in the Post. Many of these projects were riddled on the floor of the House during discussion under the five-minute rule, and some of them are exposed by engineers' reports in the argument of March 26, which appears in the RECORD of April 10. I do not desire to repeat, but will add a few suggestions which are invited by the Post article appearing in the RECORD.

THE HUMPHREYS-RANSDELL $60,000,000 BILL.

It may be fair comment to suggest that the writer of that article is possibly biased in his views, because of generous appropriations shoveled into the Mississippi and Louisiana creeks and bayous, together with the rich $7,000,000 plum in the 1914 bill for the lower Mississippi, where traffic has decreased 93 per cent, according to Government statistics. Or it may be that he is unconsciously influenced by the Humphreys-Ransdell bill to appropriate $60,000,000—a bill which overshadows all other waterways projects to-day. By a surprising coincidence, Mr. HUMPHREYS, who wrote the Post article, and the Senator who secured its insertion in the RECORD are joint collaborators, partners, and proprietors in and of the hyphenated Humphreys-Ransdell $60,000,000 Mississippi River bill, which makes some claim to our attention at this time.

Mr. Chairman, on page 7078 of the RECORD for April 10 I made a brief observation of the Mississippi River reclamation scheme, a statement based on the deliberate and disinterested opinion of different river men familiar with river conditions for 50 years and more, which gives their unbiased judgment much weight. Summed up in a few words, it is, as I then stated, as follows:

RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

We are informed that the disguise is now to be thrown off. A new theory to justify wasteful expenditures has been devised. Navigation has almost vanished. It is no longer a word to conjure by, and so the country is hearing a new call to arms, with its slogan "Reclamation."

Far be it from me to measure individual judgment with technical Army engineers or interested parties who paint highly colored pictures for Presidents and lesser officials on junketing trips.

The reclamation of the Mississippi is to be embarked upon by these same willing Army engineers, who estimate it will cost $275,000,000 to harness both banks of the Mississippi River for a distance of 1,000 miles, to the mouth of the river. Experienced rivermen with whom I have talked, and who know every foot of the river, laugh at this new evidence of stupendous engineering folly, which proposes to spend $275,000 per mile. Who is right? I will not trespass on the time of the committee further than to make a brief criticism, based on common sense, an unknown factor with Government engineers when embarking on the Oklawaha, Coosa, Kissimmee, Trinity, and other valueless engineering schemes.

Sane men, with knowledge of the tremendous visionary plan approved for the Mississippi River, declare that no reclamation can ever be moderately successful, and that $275,000,000 will not make any more lasting impression on the Mississippi River as a whole than the $100,000,000 already thrown into the river. A few favored localities may be temporarily benefited, but no State in the Mississippi Valley could be prevailed upon to contribute one-half of the expense proposed to be incurred along its own borders, because the proposition is chimerical and the slight proportionate benefits are local and largely for private interests. Army engineers do not frighten the paymaster by estimating the expense of a temporary Mississippi levee construction at a billion dollars, but this is no extravagant figure, according to rivermen familiar with the Mississippi River and its varying moods.

Presidents and public officials are accustomed to view the river when it slumbers. As well judge danger from a raging drunken outlaw armed to the teeth, by viewing him asleep and bereft of arms. The Mississippi River varies 70 feet in height at Vicksburg. It stretches out for miles in width along its turbulent course. At flood time it is a mighty rushing wall of water 70 feet in depth and reaching miles in width. The reclamation project proposes to cope with the Creator by harnessing this irresistible flood, made up by three of the greatest flood rivers in the world, the upper Mississippi, the Missouri, and the Ohio. Scores of other flood streams empty into the great rushing Father of Waters that has irresistibly swept down to the sea for thousands of centuries, and will continue to do so, unharnessed and unimpeded, for all time to come. All the temporary obstructions that can be raised by puny hands of man will be swept away, in his own time, by this raging drunken outlaw. Addle-pated engineers may waste millions of dollars of Government money in seeking to change its course. They may undermine the cities of Memphis, Vicksburg, and other cities with a criminal disregard for the consequences of their acts and the rights of citizens along its borders. To guide the Mississippi may be possible in places, although often disastrous in its consequences; to attempt to harness it from the Ohio to the Gulf, with a thousand miles and more on either side subject to flood action, is to invite the pity of an overruling Providence. Engineers may dig the Panama Canal, a wonderful feat of engineering; they may be able to canalize the Rocky Mountains, using glacier and artesian waters with which to moisten the locks, in an effort to force Jim Hill to reduce Great Northern Railway rates by visionary water competition; they may institute any number of nonsensical canalization schemes until Uncle Sam's strong box reaches the same low-water level they are seeking to obviate elsewhere; but they will never harness the Mississippi.

IMPROVEMENTS THAT WASH AWAY CITIES.

The most pathetic picture witnessed by this House during the present session and which aroused the righteous indignation and sympathy of the Members generally was offered when the eloquent gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCKELLAR, pleaded with us to right a great wrong and change back to its original course the Mississippi River, which, at a prodigious expense, has been deflected by Government engineers until it now undermines the river front of the city of Memphis. With genuine anguish and convincing argument, he declared:

Our city will be washed away. We have been flooded twice since we asked for the survey. We have got to act now, for the flood comes annually since the levees have been built, and Memphis has bonded itself for a million and a half dollars.

The Government, through its Army engineers, is shown to have inflicted irreparable loss in Memphis, and, as we are informed, this is also the case with Vicksburg and other communities. Like a foolish boy with an unloaded gun, some one is sure to get hurt while trying to see what an unloaded gun will do. Memphis and Vicksburg have reason to know, because they have been shot, and their indictment of the incompetence of Army engineers is based on a knowledge of the present status of the reclamation folly.

To the piteous appeal from Memphis, the committee chairman made a response that sounds like the voice of a Spartan mother who sacrifices her first born on the altar of battle. However, this is not a cry from the home State of the committee chairman, where Kissimmee Creek and Oklawaha Creek "ha-ha" together over the $800,000 of Government money about to be poured into those creeks, apparently to aid two Florida real estate propositions, according to engineers' reports. Florida seemed ready to sacrifice Tennessee to the ravages of flood caused by our Government engineers, when the chairman replied:

The Mississippi River Commission can take care of the banks of the river at any point where there is any danger. We appropriate money enough for them. Why should we be called upon, after furnishing the large sums of money we are appropriating in this bill—$9,500,000—to furnish specific sums for any particular part of the river?

Will the Tennessee Senators be satisfied with any such cold-blooded proposition, or will they kick in the head of the pork barrel and demand that the Government of the United States right the wrong it has done and is doing by this reckless reclamation experiment? Memphis, flooded by a Mississippi River Commission's reclamation mistakes, is turned over to that commission for relief. It is as sensible a proceeding as to refer a resolution of investigation of the pernicious pork barrel over to the River and Harbor Committee, which stands sponsor for the barrel. And that has actually been done, as I propose to show in a few moments. What does Memphis say of the Ransdell-Humphreys $60,000,000 Mississippi pork-barrel bill? Quoting from the Memphis Scimitar of January 12, 1914, we find this opinion:

It is claimed by those high in authority that the Ransdell-Humphreys bill should be entitled "A bill to destroy the navigability of the Mississippi River and to eventually make it impossible to protect the valley from devastation by floods."

A BILL TO DESTROY NAVIGABILITY.

We should remember that this is the bill prepared and championed by the gentleman from Mississippi, who so entertainingly explains in the Saturday Evening Post about the inside of the 1914 pork barrel. Some interesting features of this particular piece of pork he forgot to mention, as I shall endeavor to point out later. Before doing so, however, I quote further from a letter written by George H. Maxwell, on December 6, 1913. He is a man who has made a study of the reclamation project, which is fathered and mothered by the gentlemen from Mississippi and Louisiana, respectively, both of whom contribute generously, each in his own way, to the circulation of the Saturday Evening Post article. Mr. Maxwell writes:

The Ransdell-Humphreys bill, instead of providing a remedy for this inevitable destruction of our greatest natural waterway, provides a system that will expedite the destruction. That is a fact which can not be controverted, no authority in support of the statement being necessary except a reference to the reports of the Army engineers of the War Department of the United States.

Nothing that a new Member can offer to a patient public which foots the bills will approach in severity this castigation of the $60,000,000 Humphreys-Ransdell bill, included, but not mentioned, in the Post article.

SEVERAL RAILROADS THAT FOOT THE BILLS.

Mr. Chairman, whence comes the powerful influence behind the Humphreys-Ransdell bill, and, incidentally, in favor of the 1914 pork barrel? I have before me what purports to be a photographic copy of a typewritten statement made by John A. Fox, secretary and manager of the Mississippi Levee Association, wherein he states as follows in regard to the bill:

It has been estimated that a minimum fund of $30,000 per annum is necessary for this organization to do its work in a complete and thorough manner, and already a considerable portion of this sum has been pledged annually for five years (of $150,000 in all). The subscriptions are as follows:

Southern Railway Co	$1,000
Mobile & Ohio R. R	1,000
Frisco R. R	1,000
Missouri Pacific R. R	1,000
Chi. R. I. & Pac. R. R	1,000
St. Louis and So. Wes. R	1,000
Illinois Central	1,000
Y. & M. V	1,000
Chi. Mill. & Lumber Co	1,000
Caldwell & Smith, Memphis	1,000
International Harvester Co	1,000

Assurance has been given of other substantial amounts.

Mr. Chairman, the full purport of this statement should not be overlooked. We have no means of knowing how this $150,000 was spent or is to be spent in a "complete and thorough manner" while promoting the gospel of the Humphreys-Ransdell bill before Congress or while incidentally advancing the pork barrel, which is destined to carry $12,000,000 for the Mississippi River next year. The Post article, in its scintillating shafts of wit poked at new Members, makes no mention of this fund.

Until a rigid investigation is held to ascertain the influence of money and of lobbyists from this and other quarters in promoting publicity and the fortunes of the "pork barrel" no one can speak positively of the extent or use of funds contributed to push along the barrel; but it is significant that a number of railway companies now doubtlessly pounding at the doors of the Interstate Commerce Commission for a 5 per cent raise in freight rates are among the substantial contributors of stockholders' money to the Humphreys-Ransdell bill. How many other pork barrels, public and private, are being aided by these public-service corporations is a matter of speculation only to be revealed upon a proper investigation such as I have proposed by resolution.

CONGRESS SHOULD HAVE THE FACTS.

When railways subscribe to a fund which is to be used in urging upon Congress the passage of the Humphreys-Ransdell bill it is well to inquire what other agencies are being employed. By what right do railways take stockholders' money for the purpose of advancing this river scheme or any other scheme? By what legal right have eight railways obligated themselves to contribute annually to this corrupt fund? Corrupt in character because hidden from public gaze, to be used secretly, as far as the general public is concerned. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the promotion of what and by what methods? The Post article is silent on this interesting point. Members of Congress have a right to know who got this money. Has it all been spent, or what is the status of the fund? What other funds have been raised for influencing Congressmen in favor of the Humphreys-Ransdell bill? Only an investigation by a disinterested body will give us the facts to which we are entitled.

As if to further prove the fallacious, untrue, and ridiculous claims of waterway advocates that the railways fear water competition—which has disappeared from our rivers—we here find eight great railways contributing annually to a fund for the purpose of pushing a waterway proposition on the greatest river in the country. A statement of the facts is sufficient without argument, unless the purpose of the Humphreys-Ransdell bill is to completely destroy possibilities of navigation, as is stated by the authorities I have quoted.

THE HUMPHREYS-RANSDELL BILL'S BIG STICK.

In addition to its $150,000 promotion fund, the Humphreys-Ransdell bill, or, more correctly speaking, its supporters, are charged with swinging a big stick on other organizations to force the measure through Congress. This charge does not come from irresponsible sources, but from an association presided over by one of the ablest Members upon this floor and one of the most vigorous champions of the intracoastal system, Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, of Philadelphia. The association supports a monthly journal devoted to waterways. In a recent number, published in February, 1914, the following vigorous protest speaks volumes for the effective work now being secretly carried on for the $60,000,000 Humphreys-Ransdell bill. It reads as follows:

Business men in the Eastern States may not realize the systematic campaign which is being waged from points in the Mississippi Valley to dragoon everyone into the ranks for an unprecedentedly large and continuing appropriation for the Mississippi River. Some of these letters amount practically to threats of transfer of business unless eastern houses fall in line and go on record with their Congressmen in favor of the project. Without present discussion of the merits of the bill, and for obvious reasons omitting names, the following letter sent us by an eastern correspondent is herewith reproduced as a matter of information:

"GENTLEMEN: Will not your firm kindly aid in the matter of securing national legislation such as will prevent a recurrence of the disastrous floods of 1912 and 1913 on the lower Mississippi River?

"A measure known as the Ransdell-Humphreys bill, providing for the expenditure of $60,000,000 by the National Government to complete the levee system during the next five years and thereby prevent these disastrous floods, is now before Congress.

"This measure was framed in accordance with the plans and recommendations of the Army engineers and provides the only practicable and feasible means of solving the problem.

"The people of the region affected have already contributed $70,000,000, and it is considered but right that the Nation contribute its share toward controlling the flood waters from so great a part of the country on a stream of such national magnitude.

"Letters from your firm asking the delegation from your State to support the measure in Congress will help us very greatly, and as our loss is your loss and our prosperity your prosperity, we hope that you will feel a personal interest in the matter."

CONGRESSMEN MUST FAIRLY DIVIDE "PORK."

"For ways that are dark" this threatening campaign is original. "Our loss is your loss and our prosperity is your prosperity." Was this a reference to mutual claims upon the pork barrel, or did it mean that southern business houses were about to secede from northern connections unless the Pennsylvania Congressmen came across with their support?

The waterways journal, from the City of Brotherly Love, understands it to be the demand of a legislative highwayman organization, and it protests against this unprofessional campaign carried on by the Ransdell-Humphreys bill. With the ethical standards of either organization we are not concerned, but what other interesting leads might be developed by an investigation of the $150,000 promotion fund or the wielding of a big stick whereby hesitating Congressmen are forced to join in an irresistable political push on the pork barrel. A careful perusal of the Post article fails to discover any of these interesting facts. The article does devote a large share of its space to a leading Senator whose opposition to the bill is frankly admitted and feared by both parties to the gentlemen's agreement known as the Humphreys-Ransdell bill; but why was a column and more of valuable space in the Post accorded a curiously mixed challenge and appeal to the Senator, when a great reading public would have been more deeply interested in the methods pursued by those who keep the barrel rolling? What interesting facts might have been disclosed in the Post regarding the use of the railway corruption fund which was expected to reach $150,000. What novel campaign methods might have been disclosed of big-stick methods in connection with the pork barrel. All these topics of intense interest in connection with the $60,000,000 Humphreys-Ransdell bill were missing from the entertaining Post article written by the distinguished Member from Mississippi and placed in the RECORD by his no less distinguished coadjutor, the Senator from Louisiana.

A MUTUAL BRIBERY ASSOCIATION.

The public would like to know the power behind the pork barrel. It would like to know what methods are pursued by the various waterways associations. I am not attributing improper methods to any organization, but urge that enough has been developed to justify a thoroughgoing investigation. In this connection I offer an extract from the report of a subcommittee of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation made to the board and adopted by it. The report covers several pages, but I shall offer only a few extracts of an extremely illuminating report. It says of a prominent waterways association that is organized to push the pork barrel:

Its object, as stated in its circulars, is to arouse public interest to such an extent that a united demand coming from all sections of the country for regular and adequate rivers and harbors appropriations will induce Congress to provide an annual rivers and harbors bill of $50,000,000.

Continuing, the report says of the association:

A general indorsement is given of all projects heretofore approved by the United States Engineers, the completion of which would require from $320,000,000 to $350,000,000, but no effort is made to ascertain or verify the necessity or value of such projects and plans. The organization, while advocating and demanding enormous and unprecedented appropriations from the Public Treasury, thus cleverly attempts to avoid all the responsibilities for its proper and honest expenditure. Another advantage to them of this policy is that they avoid all dissensions among themselves over questions of merit as to projects proposed. They welcome to the support of their cause everybody who wants an appropriation from the Treasury, and none is repulsed. The wonder is that their numbers are not larger.

Again, the report says of the association:

There will be more money to go around, but if the Rivers and Harbors Congress should succeed in their plan "to arouse public interest (they should have said cupidity) to such an extent that a united demand coming from all sections of the country" would develop new schemes of improvement before unheard of, the demands for appropriations for unworthy projects would be increased far out of proportion to the worthy ones, and so the difficulties would be aggravated. It would foster beyond all previous experience the most pernicious of all methods of procuring legislation, known as "log rolling," a species of mutual bribery among those actively interested already too much in evidence for the health of the public morals and the interest of the tax-paying public.

RIVER IMPROVEMENT A "HUMBUG AND STEAL."

This report is sent out by one of the greatest business organizations of the country. It calls a spade a spade. It calls "logrolling" a species of "mutual bribery" among those "too much in evidence for the health of public morals and the interest of the tax-paying public." What organization did the New York Board of Trade have reference to and what has been its activities in past years? What interesting reading this report would be to the million readers of the Post, who pay taxes and confidently believe, after reading "The Inside of the Pork Barrel," that solid chunks of wisdom, scintillating with witticisms, furnished by the Post's high congressional authority, justify the existence of the 1914 pork barrel—the worst in the history of the country.

What a suggestive definition comes from the New York Board of Trade when it says "log rolling is a species of mutual bribery." Almost as comprehensive as the utterance of a distinguished Senator a dozen years ago, when he said, "The Mississippi has quit having any steamboats on it almost, and the whole scheme of river improvement is a humbug and a steal." And yet the author of a bill to appropriate $60,000,000 for the Mississippi says, in his Post article, "criticism of those who speak without knowledge and the censure of those who scold without reason may well be disregarded."

A certain wise old ancestor of ours said, many centuries ago, "Dissembling profiteth nothing; a feigned countenance and slightly forged external deceiveth but very few." Speaking impersonally, Old Seneca must then have had in mind some of the pork-barrel projects that are damned by faint praise by their promoters when he gave to the world his words of wisdom.

SOME THINGS NOT EXPLAINED.

Mr. Chairman, with full knowledge that the rivers and harbors bill of 1914 is what the distinguished Senator declared it to be, "a humbug and a steal"; with full knowledge that scores of wasteful projects aggregating millions of dollars are to be abstracted from the Government Treasury for such faked improvements; with knowledge that Army engineers have attempted to withstand the political influence back of certain real estate projects to be financed by the Government, as shown by the reports; with full knowledge that the whole scheme of dribbling appropriations for river improvements is unbusinesslike, wasteful, and responsible for pork-barrel methods; with full knowledge that the 1914 river and harbor bill as it passed the House was worse than any of its predecessors which have come to my attention; with full knowledge that the 1914 bill, which comes back to the House, will be notoriously worse than when it passed the House and worse than any of its predecessors; with full knowledge that many of the projects are for private interests and not urged for the public interest; with full knowledge that there prevails throughout the country a clear, well-defined opinion that there is something rotten nearer home than Denmark, when river and harbor legislation is being slipped through Congress; with full knowledge that the stultifying measure is repellant to a great majority of the Members of Congress who are caught under the barrel by the unjust and improper demands of their constituents; with full knowledge that eight railways and various other concerns have been improperly using moneys belonging to stockholders of such concerns to secretly force Congress to pass a pork-barrel measure; with full knowledge that an association in 1914 has been swinging a big stick among the customers of its members in order to unfairly compel Congressmen to fall in line for this same pork barrel; with full knowledge that the New York Board of Trade refused to become a supporter of a nation-wide association which was proposing to put through an annual pork barrel of $50,000,000, based on the principle of "mutual bribery"; with full knowledge of all these facts based on evidence which seemed to me to be conclusive and which I am ready and willing to submit to any investigating body prepared to learn the truth, I introduced the following concurrent resolution in the House on May 4:

WHY AN INVESTIGATION IS ASKED.

Whereas many millions of dollars of public moneys are annually wasted on our rivers and an absence of businesslike methods is being pursued by the Government in carrying on river and harbor improvements, the following facts are submitted as a preamble in support of this resolution:

That on March 17, 1914, the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee stated to the House as follows: "Why, there are propositions advanced, some of them now before Congress, advocated and supported by men of national repute, the adoption and carrying out of which, it is said by competent engineers, would cost billions of dollars";

That river and harbor appropriations have increased approximately 500 per cent, whereas navigation on rivers has decreased 80 per cent, as shown by the following Government data;

Appropriations for rivers and harbors: Eighteen hundred and seventy-five to eighteen hundred and ninety-four—20 years—$187,099,000; 1894 to 1904—10 years—$184,425,000; 1911 to 1914—4 years—$184,345,000.

The following river traffic is reported from the city of St. Louis: Missouri River, 1890, 31,385 tons; 1906, 6,050 tons; loss, 80 per cent. Lower Mississippi, 1890, 765,880 tons; 1906, 141,575 tons; loss, 81 per cent.

That commerce on practically all inland waterways, excepting the Great Lakes, has greatly decreased and often been driven from the rivers by railway competition;

That the Interstate Commerce Commission and railway commissions of the several States have general powers to reduce railway freight rates wherever conditions warrant and to prevent increase wherever reduction has once been made;

That the river and harbor bill for 1914 as passed by the House appropriates or authorizes an expenditure of $43,289,004, in addition to $32,895,871 in new projects begun and to be maintained by continuing appropriations from future Congresses, in all calling for a proposed expenditure of $76,184,875. To this vast amount, judging from past experience, will be added from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 before the bill is returned from the Senate;

That the adopted projects which we are obligated to complete, including those embraced in the 1914 bill, involve a future expenditure of $305,500,000;

That in addition thereto the Army engineers have recommended 93 new projects, which will require a further expenditure of $92,500,000 whenever Congress can be prevailed upon to make such appropriations;

That 120 additional surveys are authorized by the 1914 bill as it passed the House, which will require an indefinite amount for such projects, possibly reaching $100,000,000, judging from the average last noted;

That to these extravagant expenditures will eventually be added billions of dollars, according to the opinion of the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, whenever men of national repute now advocating and supporting other projects can secure their adoption;

RIVER NAVIGATION HAS DECREASED OVER 80 PER CENT.

That the 1914 bill as it passed the House appropriated $9,500,000 for the Mississippi River, 84 per cent of which is to be expended on the lower river, notwithstanding its commerce decreased over 80 per cent during the past 20 years;

That the Mississippi River Commission on April 14, 1914, at St. Louis, recommended to Congress a further appropriation of $12,000,000 for the Mississippi River for next year;

That the 1914 bill as it passed the House appropriates $2,000,000 for the lower Missouri River, between Kansas City and the Mississippi, which appropriation is part of a $20,000,000 project for that portion of the river, notwithstanding traffic is negligible and actual commerce is alleged to have cost the Government approximately $100 per ton for 1912;

That the 1914 bill as it passed the House appropriates $5,000,000 for canalizing, near the Ohio River, a $64,000,000 project, comprehending 63 locks, but no part of the open-river service. Canal freight for 1912 is alleged to have cost the Government over $35 per ton, after allowing full railway freight rates for coal traffic;

That after spending many millions of dollars on the Coosa, Trinity, Brazos, and Red Rivers, these projects are now alleged to be of no practicable benefit to navigation;

That the intracoastal waterways project, present and postponed, as reported by Government engineers, involves a past, present, and proposed expenditure, with many connecting links not included, of $96,931,006;

That this system includes the construction of new canals of doubtful value, the purchase, through the 1914 bill, of a bankrupt canal proposition the stock of which is shown to be worthless; of projects that propose to especially benefit certain communities to the injury of others, and projects which it is alleged will drive legitimate private waterway ventures into bankruptcy;

That the 1914 bill as passed by the House contains appropriations for projects where the expenditure, according to engineers' reports, is exclusively for local private business interests and not for use by the general public;

That the 1914 bill as passed by the House contains appropriations for creeks which, according to the accompanying engineers' reports, are dry for eight months in the year;

That the 1914 bill as passed by the House contains appropriations for creeks involving in a single instance an appropriation of $750,000, wherein it is alleged the engineers' report was reversed after real estate speculators had brought political pressure to bear in such case;

That the 1914 bill does not carry appropriations for the full amount required to complete projects as asked for by engineers in many cases, thereby preventing the Government from entering into proper or profitable contracts until full appropriations are made;

That the 1914 bill is open to all the objections urged by President Taft against the 1910 bill for the last-mentioned reasons and contains wasteful appropriations amounting to many millions of dollars: Therefore for the foregoing reasons it is

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to immediately investigate and as soon as practicable report to Congress the following information:

1. The character and amount of proposed expenditures by the Government now being advocated and supported "by men of national repute," as stated on the floor of the House, the adoption and carrying out of which will cost billions of dollars.

2. The character and value to the general public of projects to which the Government is now committed aggregating $305,000,000.

3. The character and value to the general public of 93 new projects recommended by Army engineers but not yet adopted by Congress which will require a further expenditure of $92,500,000.

4. The character and value to the general public of 120 new surveys authorized by the 1914 bill as it passed the House, which will require an indefinite amount reaching to over $100,000,000, based on average last noted, providing such projects are recommended by the Army Engineers.

5. To report all river or harbor projects begun and afterwards abandoned by the Government within the past 40 years, together with all expenditures so wasted and reasons for such abandonment.

6. To report as to the truth or falsity of the statement made upon the floor of the Senate that "the whole scheme of river improvement is a humbug and a steal," and to report further as to the truth or falsity of statements made during debate in the House that the river and harbor bill for 1914 as it passed the House is a fraud upon the people, a pork-barrel raid upon the Federal Treasury, approximating in its scope an expenditure of over $76,000,000, and more vicious in character than any of its predecessors.

CONGRESS SHOULD KNOW THE FACTS.

7. To investigate and report all active influences urging the adoption of the Mississippi River reclamation, the Ohio River canalization, the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal, and other projects contained in the 1914 bill as it passed the House, together with the names of all organizations, companies, individuals, or hired lobbyists now actively engaged in urging such projects.

8. To report fully as to the Mississippi River reclamation project, its probable cost, local benefits to be conferred and value of any lands to be reclaimed; the ownership of such lands; the contributions equitably required from adjoining States, municipalities, or individual interests, if any; the injuries to Memphis, Vicksburg, and other communities alleged on the floor of the House to have been caused by ill-advised engineering projects, and further to report as to the permanence of the reclamation project and probable value compared with Government expenditures required.

9. To investigate and report as to the desirability of having the Government take over the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal at double its actual value fixed by the House committee; to report whether the canal company stock is worthless and its bonds valued at only 50 cents on the dollar, as stated on the floor of the House; to report whether this canal project can be completed for $10,514,290, as estimated by Army engineers; to report whether such amount includes the Government contribution of $450,000, made about 90 years ago, and accumulated interest and dividends wrongfully withheld during that period; and to report further whether or not the project is to be taken over for the especial benefit of canal bondholders and shipping interests of Baltimore and Philadelphia. In making such investigation the commission is directed to not limit its hearings to stock and bond holders of the canal company, or to local political influences or interested shipping interests of Baltimore or Philadelphia.

10. To report further what river and harbor projects now under consideration are for the benefit of strictly private business interests without corresponding benefits to the general public, and the influences that secured such projects for such interests.

11. To report what proportionate benefits should occasion contributions, and to what extent, from local communities, particularly where improvements are of strictly local value and of no material aid to navigation.

12. To report the financial policy or absence of policy pursued by the Government as to rivers and harbors during the past 40 years; benefits that have accrued to the public through improved river navigation and increased river traffic, if any, resulting from such improvements, together with all further available information on the subject that may be had, together with such recommendations based thereon as may be found proper to make in the premises, having particular reference to the following information:

13. To report the practicability of taking away from the Chief of Army Engineers the exclusive right and power of determining the commercial necessity of river and harbor projects and leaving with the Army Engineers' Bureau the single question of technical engineering work.

14. To report the practicability of turning over to the Interstate Commerce Commission or to the Department of Commerce all river and harbor improvements, with full power to exercise all the duties now imposed upon the Army Engineering Bureau, excepting such duties as strictly pertain to civil engineering.

SMOTHERING A RESOLUTION.

Mr. Chairman, I have recited the facts on which the resolution is based and the authority for each separate provision of the resolution which to me seems possessed of merit and has a vital relation to public morals, legislative practices, and "the interests of the tax-paying public." The resolution was introduced in all seriousness, and in some form is sure to eventually receive the attention it deserves, although the irony of fate never played a better hand against its present consideration than when the resolution was referred to the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

I offer no invidious criticism against the Rivers and Harbors Committee individually or collectively, but ask any Member not utterly devoid of a sense of humor to picture to himself the possibility of securing a genuine investigation or a favorable report on such a resolution at the hands of that committee. It is sufficient to say that the resolution has been in the hands of the committee for about a month. Nothing has been heard of it. Nothing will be heard of it. Smothered in the interests of expediency and harmony, the resolution is sure to die a peaceful death.

The Mulhall investigation would never have occupied the attention of Congress but for the publicity forced through the columns of the press. I believe that some publicity will be directed at the notorious pork barrel and the legislative atmosphere surrounding it within the near future. The smug complacency with which the Post article reviews the situation and brushes aside specific charges of fraud shown to exist in the bill is not a discouraging sign of moral inertia, but rather evidences the legree to which public conscience has been dulled by what the New York Board of Trade terms "log rolling" by a system of "mutual bribery." Members of the House and Senate frankly admit the truth of this statement and denounce the system, repudiating the whole dishonest pork-barrel scheme. Constituents who demand local improvements, whether warranted or wasteful, are primarily to blame. They force Members to stand for some local improvement, and this one improvement becomes but a single stave in the great pork barrel which stands or falls through a union of purposes, good and bad, in a raid on the Federal Treasury.

The Saturday Evening Post article is placed in the RECORD as the best defense the pork barrel can make, although, as stated before, its primary purpose is to forestall public opinion if the iniquitous 1914 bill becomes a law—which the Lord forbid. I could have wished that, with all the splendid influence the Post possesses of a million circulation, the heavy guns of its able corps of editorial writers had been trained against the bill. This was much to expect; and yet I believe it must eventually come to that, however great may be the present home pressure exerted by powerful interests in favor of this bill.

PAPERS THAT REFLECT PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

Mr. Chairman, I could present to the House many columns of strong commendatory editorials from scores of leading papers all over the country that declare the fight is just begun and that the pork barrel must go. An extract from an editorial published by one of the greatest papers in the country, both in circulation and in aggressive efforts for the moral uplift of the country, says:

The Tribune is in sympathy with Congressman FREAR'S disgust with the gigantic evil of the pork barrel, the gigantic waste of public funds on public works which are not public improvements, but merely local grafts.

The foregoing sentiment is respectfully referred to the distinguished author of the Post article for thoughtful consideration. A column editorial from another great daily, possessed of one of the most forceful editorial writers in the country, says, after a careful analysis of the question:

The professed river expenditures are a reproach to every Congress that passes one of these budgets.

Another paper, in a strong, comprehensive editorial, says:

The most notorious of the so-called pork-barrel measures which regularly are adopted by Congress is concededly the river and harbor bill—a system based on politics and so unjust, unfair, unreasonable, and absolutely wasteful that it loudly calls for drastic reform.

The able writer of the Post article to the contrary notwithstanding. Still another daily, in a long editorial, concludes with the uncontrovertible statement that—the river appropriations constitute the greatest pork barrel that was ever devised.

I could quote from many other strong editorials which have come to my hands all, without exeception, in the same general vein. While the unpleasant task had brought many kind words which are highly prized, it is a disagreeable duty to perform, this taking off of the lid. Disagreeable because I would gladly prefer to serve fellow Members to the extent of my ability, nor would I willingly even inferentially question the motives of any individual Member; but, although I regret having to attack a bill that contains some desirable and meritorious projects, I consider it my duty in a humble way, however futile in effect, to continue to point out indefensible items in and methods of this indefensible pork barrel.

WHY THE PRESIDENT SHOULD VETO THE BILL.

Mr. Chairman, I know the power of the opposition and realize that to expect defeat for the 1914 bill is probably an idle dream. I do hope that its viciousness will be exposed by able men at the other end of the Capitol so as to gain the attention of the public to pork-barrel projects. A conscientious, strong public official as I believe the President to be, will not, in my judgment, remain blind or deaf to the facts concerning this vicious bill, and to him we have a right of appeal. Such appeals have not fallen on deaf ears in the past. I refuse to believe they will fail with an administration which was placed in power because of its promises of public honesty and economy.

Mr. Chairman, the 1914 bill as it passed the House appropriated $43,289,004 in cash and over $76,000,000 in present and future obligations assumed this year. Pending amendments at the other end of the Capitol are reported to increase the cash appropriated to nearly $50,000,000 and present and future obligations to $88,000,000. While considering these enormous figures presented to a waiting public by a Congress pledged to economy, I came across a presidential veto message, promulgated in 1896, that furnishes a model form for ready letter writing when the enormous 1914 pork barrel takes its place upon the witness stand before President Wilson.

In his veto message (54th Cong., H. Doc. 393) President Cleveland denounced the $14,000,000 "humbug and steal" and the practice of running up continuing obligations, of which $310,000,000 confront us to-day. His message reads in part:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 7977, entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes."

There are 417 items of appropriation contained in this bill, and every part of the country is represented in the distribution of its favors.

It directly appropriates or provides for the immediate expenditure of nearly $14,000,000 for river and harbor work. This sum is in addition to appropriations contained in another bill for similar purposes amounting to a little over $3,000,000, which have already been favorably considered at the present session of Congress.

The result is that the contemplated immediate expenditures for the objects mentioned amount to about $17,000,000.

A more startling feature of this bill is its authorization of contracts for river and harbor work amounting to more than $62,000,000. Though the payments of these contracts are in most cases so distributed that they are to be met by future appropriations, more than $3,000,000 on their account are included in the direct appropriations above mentioned. Of the remainder, nearly $20,000,000 will fall due during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and amounts somewhat less in the years immediately succeeding. A few contracts of a like character, authorized under previous statutes, are still outstanding, and to meet payments on these more than $4,000,000 must be appropriated in the immediate future.

If, therefore, this bill becomes a law the obligations imposed on the Government, together with the appropriations made for immediate expenditure on account of rivers and harbors, will amount to about $80,000,000. Nor is this all. The bill directs numerous surveys and examinations which contemplate new work and further contracts, and which portend largely increased expenditures and obligations.

There is no ground to hope that in the face of persistent and growing demands the aggregate of appropriations for the smaller schemes not covered by contracts will be reduced or even remain stationary. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, such appropriations, together with the installments of contracts which will fall due in that year, can hardly be less than $30,000,000; and it may reasonably be apprehended that the prevalent tendency toward increased expenditures of this sort and the concealment which postponed payments afford for extravagance will increase the burdens chargeable to this account in succeeding years.

In view of the obligations imposed upon me by the Constitution, it seems to me quite clear that I only discharge a duty to our people when I interpose my disapproval of the legislation proposed. Many of the objects for which it appropriates public money are not related to the public welfare, and many of them are palpably for the benefit of limited localities or in the aid of public interests.

"UNWISE EXPENDITURE OF MILLIONS."

On the face of the bill it appears that not a few of these alleged improvements have been so improvidently planned and prosecuted that after an unwise expenditure of millions of dollars new experiments for their accomplishment have been entered upon.

* * * * * * *

Individual economy and careful expenditure are sterling virtues which lead to thrift and comfort. Economy and the exaction of clear justification for the appropriations of public moneys by the servants of the people are not only virtues, but solemn obligations.

To the extent that the appropriations carried in this bill are instigated by private interests and promote local or individual projects, their allowance can not fail to stimulate a vicious paternalism and encourage a sentiment among our people, already too prevalent, that their attachment to our Government may properly rest upon the hope and expectation of direct and especial favors, and that the extent to which they are realized may furnish an estimate of the value of governmental care.

I believe no greater danger confronts us as a Nation than the unhappy decadence among our people of genuine and trustworthy love and affection for our Government as the embodiment of the highest and best aspirations of humanity, and not as the giver of gifts, and because its mission is the enforcement of exact justice and equality and not the allowance of unfair favoritism.

I hope I may be permitted to suggest, at a time when the issue of Government bonds to maintain the credit and financial standing of the country is a subject of criticism, that the contracts provided for in this bill would create obligations of the United States, amounting to $62,000,000, no less binding than its bonds for that sum.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 29, 1896.

"WE CALL ATTENTION TO RECORD OF ECONOMY."

Practically every argument urged by President Cleveland against the small 1896 bill applies with far greater force to the 1914 measure, judging from the reports of engineers and the enormous raid about to be made upon the Federal Treasury.

What would President Cleveland have said had he been confronted with the present $88,000 000 pork barrel, a $310,000,000 obligation for future projects, and a river traffic which has decreased over 80 per cent since his day and age? What would Democracy's President of 1896 say, when officially advised that measures costing billions of dollars are now being advocated and supported "by men of national repute"? What would the man of 1896, greater than his party, say upon reading in the Baltimore platform declaration—

We call the attention of the patriotic citizens of our country to the record of economy and constructive legislation of the Democratic House of Representatives.

Or that other sounding declaration—

We denounce the profligate waste of money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses. * * * We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic Government.

When he viewed the monumental hypocrite that is waiting with $88,000,000 in its barrel, knocking at the White House door, he would have said things that ought not to be uttered—even by Presidents. What would Cleveland do to-day if in the White House? What will President Wilson do with this unprecedented "humbug and steal" that is lauded by the Post article?

Mr. Chairman, I have concluded to offer these observations with some reluctance, but I am firmly convinced that the Saturday Evening Post article which has now been incorporated into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should not go to the country unchallenged. Believing the article to be misleading in character and shrewdly timed for the purpose of influencing public sentiment and legislation on the 1914 bill, I have expressed my dissent from the views contained in the Post article.

A JOURNAL'S MORAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Every man on this floor familiar with the facts knows that the "inside of the pork barrel" was not presented to public view by that article. I say this with profound regret, because of the far-reaching influence of that great journal. To say that its management has been imposed upon is, I believe, to express the judgment of Congress, whatever may be the verdict on the pork barrel. The moral responsibility to the country of any journal is as great as that of any Member of Congress, while the influence of the Post for good or bad is greater than that of any Member of either branch of Congress, because it speaks to a million people every week. In my humble judgment, its influence cast against the 1914 river and harbor bill would have insured the bill's defeat, because the pork barrel is built in the dark, and it will quickly fall to pieces when exposed to searching publicity.

The author of that article, the gentleman from Mississippi, has given public testimony that my action is based upon the belief that by seeking the defeat of the pork barrel I am serving my country well. I am content to offer no excuse in seeking to have the truth regarding that measure placed before the country. The Post article, sent through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, purports to give a view of the "inside of the pork barrel," but its attractive picture, made up of glittering generalities, bears no more resemblance to the Janus-faced, vicious measure of 1914 than a fragrant bouquet bears to the garbage barrel. Surely it is a marked coincidence that the ill-smelling garbage barrel is attractive only to those animals that find their last resting place in another famous barrel dedicated to their kind.

THE BURDEN TO EVERY HOUSEHOLDER.

In my remarks of March 26, following a five days' discussion of the bill in the House, an effort was made to fairly show the true inwardness of the pork barrel, and that analysis was supported by the best obtainable testimony, including reports of examining Government engineers, together with Government statistics, that have not been controverted. The wasteful measure now approximating $88,000,000, as it comes out of the Senate committee, in actual obligations, places an average burden on the head of every family in the country approximating $5. Future obligations which are to be met for this same wasteful purpose increases the average burden to each family head to $15, and for every $1,000,000,000 of pork-barrel projects which are now impending, backed by men of national repute, according to Chairman SPARKMAN'S official statement, the burden will be increased to $50 for the head of every family in the country on the general average. In my remarks of March 26 I sought to present the vast waste of taxpayers' money when viewed from the inside of the pork barrel.

Mr. Chairman, in these remarks here hurriedly presented I have tried to disclose the hidden springs which lurk inside the barrel and which determine its character and its course. Contributions by railroads to influence Congressmen have been shown, as revealed by the statement of the secretary of the Humphreys-Ransdell organization. Masked guns aimed by business interests have been trained upon Congressmen, according to a responsible waterways publication. A $50,000,000 annual logrolling association built around "mutual bribery" is disclosed by one of the greatest commercial bodies in the country. Incidentally it has been shown that the pork barrel has been destroying the river frontage and undermining adjacent property in great cities, wasting millions of dollars annually on a stream in which over $75,000,000 has already been poured, and ruining the 7 per cent remainder of navigation now existing after a 93 per cent loss in 20 years. None of these conditions, which are upheld by testimony from high authority, has been mentioned in the Post article.

WHERE PRESIDENTS CONDEMN, THE POST APPROVES.

Opposed to the judgment of the gentlemen from Mississippi and Louisiana, who give the "inside of the pork barrel" their approval by its incorporation in the RECORD and by the secret campaign waged in favor of the Humphreys-Ransdell $60,000,000 bill, I offer the disapproval of public men who have believed they were serving their country well by public condemnation of the barrel. President Cleveland, among other severe criticisms, wrote that many of its objects are not related to the public welfare but are for the aid of private interests. That is notoriously the case in the 1914 pork barrel. President Taft declared:

I once reached the conclusion that it was my duty to interpose a veto in order, if possible, to secure a change in the method of framing these bills.

He was dissuaded only because no bill had been passed for three years. The 1914 bill is open to every objection urged by President Cleveland and by President Taft. A distinguished Senator declared the whole system is a "humbug and a steal," and no one in the Senate questioned the utterance. Another Member of the upper House once declared, "The people will not forever stand silently by and see this reckless, this wasteful expenditure of their money." Can we question that statement?

These opinions, judging from editorial utterances I have received from leading papers in many different States, are shared by the country at large. So far as my knowledge goes not one reputable newspaper in the country has said any good words for the 1914 notorious pork barrel. It is shunned by leading journals as a class, and few people have the hardihood to defend the hypocritical measure in aid of navigation. I append editorials from two of the greatest newspapers of the country, whose fearless utterances on public shams have rendered great service to their country. They reflect the general sentiment expressed in a score of others and in many letters that have come to me on the same subject.

[From the Chicago Tribune of Monday, June 1, 1914.]

THE GIANT GRAFT OF THE PORK BARREL.

Readers of Tribune editorials not infrequently encounter the word "pork," and doubtless think they comprehend what is meant. We have no doubt our readers do know what we mean by "pork," but of the importance of the word and of the cost of "pork" to the Nation we are afraid a very small proportion are informed.

"Pork" is money taken from the public till ostensibly for public improvements, but actually to build a Congressman's fences. "Pork" is an appropriation made by Congress from the United States Treasury ostensibly for the construction of some public work of benefit to the public, but actually to benefit Congressmen, either by pleasing local pride or profiting some private interest of influence upon the Congressmen's fortunes.

"Pork" does not mean money spent on necessary and beneficial public improvements, the construction of which legitimately belongs to the Nation. "Pork" is money of the public spent for private benefit, money of the Nation spent for local profit. "Pork," in short, is graft and a graft so tremendous that compared to it all the direct peculations and profits of which dishonest officials have been guilty in the history of the Nation are as a molehill to a mountain.

One of the chief forms of "pork" is harbor and river improvements. The aggregate of money which is wasted under guise of river and harbor improvement would stagger the Nation if it were ascertained. For years this waste has been going on, not merely in the form of projects which had a reasonable excuse for being and which only experience could prove unwise, but in the form of numberless projects which had no excuse from the beginning, which were plain steals made possible only under the system of logrolling.

Year after year some Congressman, usually a new hand, has fought this "pork" graft to find that his most unchallengeable objections, his most eloquent protests, were remorselessly ignored. The latest of these forlorn hopes was led by Representative JAMES A. FREAR, of Wisconsin, whose work in committee and whose speech in the House March 26 against the pending river and harbor bill brought out the evils of "pork barrel" legislation and unscrupulous logrolling with commendable courage.

It is difficult to select from the examples offered in Representative FREAR'S speech because there are so many that illustrate the inexcusable waste in this field of public expenditure. To many readers the case of the Kissimmee will appeal. This river is in Florida and is dry several months in the year—in 1907, 8 months; in 1908, 5 months. But it has been under "improvement" since 1903 and has had $30,400 spent on it. There is a politician and ex-Congressman interested in selling a tract along this river to settlers from the North.

Then there is the Coosa River project, planned in 1890 and modified in 1892, providing for 23 locks and dams at an estimated cost of $5,106,422. By June, 1909, $401,372 had been expended in completing 4 per cent of this enterprise, and the engineers reported in that year that "on account of the numerous rapids this part of the river has never been navigable," that "as yet—after 19 years—no benefit has been derived from this improvement, and its value is entirely dependent on the completion of the entire system." In 1913 the engineers reported that "a small commerce in the rafting of logs and square timber can only be carried on when the river is about 12 feet above low water, and no reliable estimate of its value can be ascertained."

The amount required for the completion of this great public enterprise is $6,059,913.

The harbor and river bill appropriates $43,289,004. New projects started in 1914 will, if carried on, involve a further expenditure of $33,000,000, so that the "pork" to be paid or promised in this bill comes to the tidy sum of $76,000,000.

If Representative FREAR exaggerates when he declares that nine-tenths of this great sum will be wasted, he will be excused by anyone who reads the long list of cases he cites. Certainly public opinion should be aroused to this gigantic graft. The President would do a public service by vetoing the present bill, not only to prevent the waste directly involved but to call nation-wide attention to the whole evil of pork.

The Tribune will return to this subject.

[From the Washington Times, Thursday, May 7, 1914.]

THE FREAR RESOLUTION.

Congressman FREAR, of Wisconsin, on March 26, delivered a remarkable speech in the House. The river and harbor bill was his subject, and he made a telling analysis of the measure. Taking up project after project, he quoted from the engineering reports to show conditions surrounding them and the pitifully small volume of traffic that could possibly be benefited by enterprises for which hundreds of thousands of dollars were asked, demonstrating that the measure as a whole plainly aimed to distribute a lot of Federal money as equitably as might be, rather than to devote it to work that would be of substantial value.

Mr. FREAR'S speech demonstrated that he had made a great study of the subject. He followed it on May 4 by introducing a concurrent resolution which probably will be duly smothered for the present, but which contains an idea that is certain before many years to be adopted.

This Frear resolution sets forth that, while these appropriations have increased 500 per cent per annum, navigation on the rivers has fallen off 80 per cent. Projects now adopted, or contained in the pending bill which is expected to pass, involve a future expenditure of $305,000,000; surveys are authorized for projects costing another $100,000,- 000; and other huge projects are now being insistently advocated which would involve billions. Mr. FREAR declares that many millions have been spent in the past on rivers to benefit navigation, and that these projects have since been abandoned as of no value and represent a dead loss.

In short, Mr. FREAR presents a startling indictment of the whole river-improvement program, insists that most of the money spent on it—several hundreds of millions—in the past has been wasted, and that unless there is a change of policy billions more will go the same way, and he winds up his resolution with a direction that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall investigate and report on the whole subject. Among other things, he would have the commission find out how much value there is in the $305,000,000 worth of projects to which the Government is now committed, what virtue there is in the billions of dollars' worth of additional projects that are insistently demanded, and what are the organizations, interests, etc., boosting them. He wants to know about paid lobbyists in this connection, and requires detailed information as to all river and harbor improvements begun and afterwards abandoned, and how much this waste has aggregated. He asks the commission to learn whether it is true that certain privately owned canals, whose stock is practically worthless, are being unloaded on the Government for huge figures, and why. He yearns for light, too, as to the extent of the property values that would be benefited by certain great river improvements that are urged; and he wants to be informed why States and cities along the Mississippi, for instance, should not pay a big slice of the expense for flood protection and the like of which they would be the beneficiaries.

In short, Mr. FREAR has cut out for the Interstate Commerce Commission a job which it couldn't possibly handle and for which it has no possible indictment, but, none the less, a job that very decidedly ought to be attended to. It should be given, not to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but to some other body. Perhaps the Department of Commerce is the right authority. Anyhow, the broad investigation that Mr. FREAR wants is demanded by the enlightened sentiment of the whole country.

We have spent hundreds of millions on our waterways; several times as much, for instance, as Germany has spent on hers. Yet at the end what do we see? Germany has restored a vast and fast-increasing traffic to her rivers; we have let the traffic be driven from our rivers. Germany has got immense returns from its river investments; we have wasted ours, for the greater part, and are going right ahead to waste more.

Some organization, coordination, and practical judgment in the selection of projects would make the river expenditures worth while. They are not worth while now. They are a reproach to every Congress that passes one of these budgets. The Frear crusade will accomplish some good and useful results if Mr. FREAR will stick by his guns and keep right on fighting till he gets a hearing.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the purpose of the program that has been announced on the trust legislation by the authors of the bills. [Applause.] You are applauding too soon. The purpose of the legislation, as it is expressed in every speech made upon this floor in support of the various measures can not, I think, be objected to. Part of these bills I favor. I shall give my support to the interstate trade commission, and do it heartily, because I believe it supplements the Sherman law, that in a sense has been effective, but not entirely so. However, this ineffectiveness is due not to the law so much as to the administration of it.

I am not satisfied with this measure now before us and can not now give my approval of it. If it is amended along the lines suggested by Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, I will support it. I hope it will be so modified. The measure that was laid aside to-day, the Clayton antitrust bill, is a measure seeking to do a thing that I have desired to see done for years. As a student for some time of the subject of concentration and control, as set forth by the investigations of Dr. Van Hise, Bruce Wyman, and a great number of experts, such as Dr. Ripley, Prof. Jenks, and Prof. Ely, I have well-defined convictions. This bill is designed by its proponents to regulate big business, without destroying the small man, but I can not see that this bill is reaching the thing that you men think it will reach. My belief is not the result of prejudice, not a desire to avoid responsibility. I have tried to be absolutely honest in my own mind. I have come to this proposition in this spirit of an open mind. If it were introduced in a Republican Congress and I could see my way to support it as a Republican measure, I would support it in this Democratic Congress, introduced by a Democrat. I have come with that open mind, rather to be fair to myself as a legislator. But if I am not mistaken, you are not striking the monopoly as you think you are, and you are striking the small business man as you think you are not. In other words, you are not hurting the enemy of business, but you are distressing the friend of it. When you deny the exclusive contract to the large business corporation, in order, as you profess, to insure competition for the small man, your limitation will not in this law interfere with monopoly, because you allow the big business concern to supersede the small dealer to whom it sells its goods by putting in his place its legal representative, a man who becomes its agent, and upon a contract where the title does not pass from the corporation to the seller, but where the seller is simply a distributor of the goods of the corporation. In such a law you are not harming the corporation, you are not lessening the danger from the big man, but you are interfering with the little man, whom you are superseding by the agent of the big man.

By this act, if it becomes a law as it now stands, the great anthracite-coal corporations will cease to make exclusive contracts with the various retail dealers in the country, but it will not interfere with the corporation sending its agents as distributors to the various localities. No one will seriously contend that such displacement of the retailer will hinder the corporation in its monopolistic tendencies, but most people must see its effect upon the retailer. What is true of anthracite coal will be true of every big concern which approaches monopolistic dimensions. It will assist the tendency of concentration without providing the necessary control we all seek, and at the same time to the distress of the small dealer.

I tried to put these questions to the men who are the proponents of the bill. They say that my fears are unfounded; but I am confident that when the Standard Oil Co. does not sell to an individual under an exclusive contract, because of the limitation in this law, that will not interfere with the Standard Oil Co. putting a distributor of its goods into every little town. To-day the exclusive contract can be reached under the Sherman law if it can be shown that it either produces monopoly or is in restraint of trade. To-day this remedy can be reached without affecting the small business man. Under this law as proposed you invite the Standard Oil Co. to distribute its products through agents instead of through the middle man. You do not reach the company, but you do affect the thousands of middle men.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield for a question.

Mr. GORDON. Has not the Standard Oil Co. got a distributing agent in every town now?

Mr. FESS. Yes; it may have, but that does not change this provision any, and I am referring to that simply as an example. What it has done you invite every big concern to do under this bill, and I take it that is the thing you do not want to do. This injury to the small man is not confined to the exclusive contract in the bill. You do it in the price discriminating provision, if I can read the matter right, and I have tried to be honest in this matter with myself.

You forbid the sale of goods except upon quality and quantity at different prices. I know your purpose, which is good. But your purpose will not be realized. This feature will not hurt the monopoly, but it will hurt the small dealer.

I have no great dealers of monopoly proportions in my district, so far as I know. But I have a most highly intelligent group of small dealers. Note how this bill operates upon them. Take, for example, the shoe industry. My constituent can not enter the market in competition with the Douglas shoe concern. The latter has its organization represented by the hundreds of representatives. It does not need to discriminate in price to secure trade, to develop a new field. The campaign of advertising, the personal persuasion of its representatives are the means to do that. This law does not harm that firm. But take the small shoe manufactory in my district, limited in its output because of its inability of developing new trade. This concern, without its agents and its campaign for new business, is denied under this law to reduce the price upon the initiation of the contract, as an inducement to take consignment, unless the same reduction is made in places where trade is already established, upon penalty of a $5,000 fine, a year imprisonment, or both.

How will the small man compete in the market with the big man? How will he develop any new trade? Wherein do we see the harm to the big man? Wherein do we see the good to the small man? I can not see it in the bill.

This is not the only feature I fear. The denial of an operator of a mine to choose his own customer is serious. In a year I have an occasion, as the president of a college, to order about 300 tons of coal. Suppose I choose not to purchase from a coal dealer in my town. I order directly from the mine. This law, in section 3, compels the operator to sell to me if I am responsible. Who is to say whether I am responsible. If he refuses arbitrarily, whatever that means—and of course that will require the courts to say—he will be subject to a fine of $5,000 and a year's imprisonment or both.

That is not all; he must not sell to me higher than to another in my town. In other words, the only way the coal dealer can buy at less price is in the question of quantity. In that case the dealer must know how much I ordered to know what he can pay. What effect will such a provision have upon the hundreds of small operators of mines? What effect will it have upon the retail dealer in the country over? Again, you do not disturb so much the few great operators, but think of the confusion of the small operator and the retailer.

I voted for the amendment which declared that labor and farmer organizations as such shall not be considered as conspiracies under the Sherman law. I would not vote for any measure that would deny either labor or farmers the right to organize for mutual helpfulness. Upon the other hand, I would not vote for any law that would exempt either from punishment for the violation of law. This amendment which I supported allows organization of these various interests, but it subjects them to punishment under the law if they do unlawful acts. I have no doubt myself upon this provision; however, there seems to be some dispute among the Members. This feature should have been clearly stated so that the courts would not have been necessary to decide it. When the direct question was put to the chairman in charge whether the bill permitted a secondary boycott, he replied it did not, and he would not vote for a measure that did. Then an amendment was offered specifying that it did not authorize it. This the committee refused to accept. It should have accepted the amendment. The bill is at fault in the sense that it lacks clearness. It will take the courts to define its meaning. This is another reason for my withholding my support.

That being the case, for these reasons, as well as others, I will have to withhold my support of this measure. I believe it catches business going and it catches it coming. Business is already in the air, and it will be more so than ever before if this act becomes a law as it goes out of this House, especially if not modified materially.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the country is as much interested in this particular line of legislation as you gentlemen think it is. It would like to have Congress adjourn. The people demand it. The press demands it. Business wants a rest. I do not think this Congress is interested in this line of legislation as much as you gentlemen think it is. I do not want to be cruel. It is my nature to approve. No man in this Chamber has heard me say anything ugly purely for partisan advantage, for it is not my nature to do so. But I want to prove to you that the Democrats in this House are not interested in this legislation. Some of us have been in constant attendance in this Chamber for the past 14 months. What does the small attendance upon the sessions signify? I have kept the roll of the Democratic side of the House for the last 10 days, making an actual record every 30 minutes, and I have it in my pocket, and I would like to read it to you to show that this Democratic Congress is not interested in this legislation. The only Democrats interested seem to be the President and the members of the Judiciary Committee. And even they, I am persuaded to think, would like to be relieved in response to the demands of the country. You are not here to take part in the discussion, and a quorum is not here now, and I can easily show you that even presidential persuasion is not sufficient to compel interest in these measures.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I am always delighted to yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thank the gentleman; he is always fair and courteous. I understand the gentleman's remarks just made apply to the bill which was laid aside to-day from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. FESS. Yes; I refer to the last 10 days.

Mr. ADAMSON. And not to the stock and bonds bill?

Mr. FESS. No. I am not suggesting a lack of interest in your measure.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman suggests that he has been keeping a record of the attendance of Members on this side of the House. I would like to ask him if he has kept a record of the presence of Members on the other side of the House.

Mr. FESS. I knew that you or some one else would ask that question.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will ask the gentleman to look on that side of the Chamber now and compare it with the attendance on this side.

Mr. FESS. I repeat that I knew that you or some one else would ask the question. I did not count the Members on the Republican side of the House, except to satisfy my own curiosity now and then, because the country will not hold the Republican side of the House responsible for legislation in this Congress, with 145 Democratic majority.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Which side is "this side"?

Mr. FESS. "This side" of the House is responsible for legislation. "This side" is the Democratic side and that side is the other side. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; certainly I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. GORDON. Upon what theory does the gentleman claim immunity for the Republicans? You draw the same salary on that side that we do on this.

Mr. FESS. A great many people in this world think there is nothing except drawing salaries. I am not so much concerned about that.

Mr. RAKER. Before the gentleman reads the roll, will my delightful and learned friend yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I could not help it now. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. Would the gentleman's record of the attendance compare favorably with the House as it is now? There are present in the House and in the lobbies 14 Republican Members and about 50 or 60 Democrats.

Mr. FESS. Such inquiries are not a satisfactory excuse for the majority party to fail to maintain a working quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. It will be noticed that the gentleman said "in the lobby."

Mr. FESS. I want to say to my friend from California that he can not draw me away from the point at issue. This is a Democratic Congress, not a Republican, and the responsibility for legislation is with you. I want to impress this fact, that while the President, for whom I have the highest regard, as everybody knows, insists upon our enacting this legislation the country would like to have us adjourn and go home. Mr. UNDERWOOD said in this Chamber recently that the country needs a rest, and under ordinary circumstances you would agree with him; but under the new tutelage of the Democracy the Congress lingers with empty seats. I do not believe that the facts here prove the statement of the President that it is wise to finish the operation.

To prove it I am going to read the record. May 21, roll call to secure quorum at 12.30; at 2 o'clock, with the appropriation bill, carrying nearly $7,000,000, before the House, Democrats in the House, 15. At 2.30, VICTOR MURDOCK on the floor discussing the interstate trade commission, Democrats in the House, 16; 2.43 o'clock, 11 Democrats in the House; 3 p. m., 16 Democrats in the House; 3.15, 18 Democrats in the House. At this time Gov. MONTAGUE, the distinguished Member from Virginia, was speaking most learnedly and effectively upon the interstate trade bill and there were but 18 Members of your party here by actual count. At 5 o'clock a roll call was ordered to secure a quorum.

Friday, May 22, 11 a. m., Journal read, 10 Democrats present; 11.15, point of no quorum was made; 2.30 p. m., 30 Democrats present; 3 p. m., 25 Democrats present; 3.30 p. m., 22 Democrats present; 4 o'clock, with the Clayton bill, the antitrust legislation under discussion, and Mr. WEBB on the floor, 28 Democrats present; at 8.20 in the evening, 26 Democrats present.

Saturday, May 23, antitrust bill in discussion; 11.15 a. m., 14 Democrats present; at 11.30 a point of no quorum was made; at 3 o'clock p. m. 22 Democrats were present; at 3.30 o'clock p. m. 14 Democrats were present; at 4 o'clock p. m. 16 Democrats were present; at 4.30 p. m. 14 Democrats were present; at 5 o'clock 16 were present. At this time the President's message was received. We then adjourned with 15 Democrats in the House. Just before adjournment a unanimous-consent request was made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to modify the rule which provided for evening session so as not to have a meeting that night, but to have the House adjourn over until Monday. Pending the request, it was stated the reason to be that no one was ready to speak, when everybody knew that a quorum was impossible.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Is it not true, according to the gentleman's report, that the gentleman was the only Republican present at all of these times?

Mr. FESS. Oh, I am not doing this in jest. I am informing the country of the lack of interest, especially among the Democratic Members, in the subject before us.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. RAINEY. Is it possible that the gentleman from North Carolina made the statement that there was no one present who wanted to speak and the gentleman himself was here? [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Oh, I would not expect to have time yielded to me by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], whose measure I am not supporting. The gentleman's sarcasm is accepted.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Oh, I think I can read to the gentleman more interesting matter than he can give to me.

Mr. HEFLIN. Just one interruption.

Mr. FESS. Very well.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman has cited instances where there were only 12 and 14 and 16 Democrats present. How can he account for the fact that the Republicans were unable to get in any amendments, when they have one hundred and thirty-odd Members in the House? Where were they?

Mr. FESS. It is not a matter of Republican legislation in a Democratic Congress. If it were, the country would know the difference. It is a matter of your people being here. On Monday, at 11 o'clock a. m., there were 12 Democrats present. I have the names of them here. At 11.30 there were 28 present in the House, and Mr. TAGGART had the floor, producing argument worthy of the House. At 12 o'clock there were 37 Democrats on the floor, and at 12.25 the House adjourned on account of the death of Senator Bradley. On Tuesday, May 26, the Journal was read at 11 o'clock, and at 11.10 o'clock a. m. there were 19 Democrats present, and the antitrust question was under consideration. Keep in mind that all speeches made, even in general debate, were confined to the issue. At 11.30 a. m. there were 28 present, at 1 o'clock there were 19 present, at 2 o'clock there were 9, and at 2.30 there were 18 and at 3 o'clock there were 24. At 3 o'clock and 2 minutes the point of no quorum was made, and when the point of no quorum was made the Chair announced that there were 62 Members present altogether, Democrats and Republicans.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Was that the afternoon when I saw the gentleman and the leader of the Republican Party, Mr. MANN, at the ball game?

Mr. FESS. No; indeed, it was not. At 4 o'clock there were 56 Democrats present, with Mr. CARLIN speaking. At 4.55 there were 28 present, when we took an adjournment.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. DECKER. Would the gentleman undertake to say that there were only 56 present when Mr. CARLIN made his speech?

Mr. FESS. There were 56 Members present at 4 o'clock, with Mr. CARLIN speaking. I would not make a record that was false. There could be nothing gained by that.

Mr. DECKER. He spoke about three hours. How many were present when he started?

Mr. FESS. He used 1 hour and 13 minutes of the 2 hours and 18 minutes yielded him. The point of no quorum was made to secure an audience for him. I suggested to him myself that I would make the point if some one else did not. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] came to the rescue.

Mr. BRYAN. I submit that is a delicate question.

Mr. FESS. I should like to state to my genial friend that I have kept this account in this way: At 2.30, at 3, at 3.30, and at 4. At 3.02 the point of no quorum was made.

Mr. DECKER. How many were present after the point of no quorum was made?

Mr. FESS. The gentleman can consult the RECORD.

Mr. DECKER. I understand; but how many were here during the speaking?

Mr. FESS. I kept the count. I have no other record except at 4 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. FESS. We will now take the next day—Wednesday. At 12 o'clock the point of no quorum was made. At 1 p. m. there were 20 Democrats present, at 1.45 p. m. there were 11 present, and at 2 o'clock there were 8 present. At 2.30 there were 7 present, at 3 there were 12 present, and at 3.30 there were 13 present. On page 9338 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD we find that there was a division called for, and the record vote was ayes 6, noes 10. On page 9340 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD we find another division was called for, and the vote was ayes 4, noes 6.

Mr. GARNER. Was not that on Wednesday when they were discussing the codification bill?

Mr. FESS. That is on May 27, Wednesday. That does not change fact any. The Democrats were not here.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the gentleman one more minute if he will allow me one more question.

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. In the gentleman's opinion, would it not afford some relief from this deplorable situation and give these lusty orators a better attendance on hot days, if you gentlemen who have an interlocking interest in both the baseball game and the proceedings of the House could adjust an allotment and division of the time, so that you could attend one in the afternoon and one in the forenoon, and have a quorum at both places. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. I hope the gentleman does not include me in the interlocking arrangement, because I am not a baseball fan.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman did not deny being at the baseball game when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asked the question.

Mr. FESS. Well, I was at the baseball game once. [Laughter.] You remember my record shows we adjourned one day at 12.25.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARKLEY. Was the House in session at the time the gentleman from Ohio was at the ball game?

Mr. FESS. I presume it was, unofficially, probably over at the ball park. I am not sure as to that. And so the record runs. I will admit that the last two days we have had a better attendance and it shows up fairly well. The interest in the labor items of the bill seems to be attractive to absent Democrats. I have the record here, and this is what I have in mind, not to twit anybody and not to put anything that is hurtful to anybody in the RECORD. I have the names and could give them, but I have no desire to do that, for it would not add to my purpose to show that this Democratic Congress is absent. I repeat that the average membership here is wanting to give the country a rest. While we are in session formally, we are exemplifying "watchful waiting" beautifully. I do not believe that the country demands this sort of legislation designed to unsettle all business. Here is the greatest institution on earth. We are dealing with the country's business, that amounts to a hundred and thirty billion dollars of wealth. It is the greatest business on earth, and yet when we have proposed acts that look to the very life of business we do not have a quorum here, and that at a moment when the President insists we must stay here and do this specific thing. I am not ugly nor facetious when I call attention to the fact that our presence in th's Chamber and our participation in the discussion do not indicate that we believe the business is important as we seem to believe. I am going to state another thing, which appears to me important at this stage.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I can not yield, because my time is going so rapidly. I want to say another thing. On the 17th day of last September I called attention to an incident that created laughter on this side of the House. I said, discussing that provision of the currency question where it provides the receipt of Federal notes in the payment of duties which heretofore were required to be paid in gold—I said at that time that you are providing a method by which you reduced the sum of gold in the Treasury. I desire to quote here what I then said, as taken from the RECORD of September 13, last year:

> Now, if you mean to maintain the gold standard and make it the redemption money in this bill, just observe what you are doing. Look at the burden which is put upon gold. First we have $346,681,000 in greenbacks, with $100,000,000 in reserve to keep them at par. This reserve fund, under law, must not be intrenched upon, even at the cost of issuing bonds. We have over $2,000,000 of Sherman notes out of the $156,000,000 of original issue, and we keep $50,000,000 of gold in the Treasury to maintain them at par. Then we have over $1,000,000,000 of gold certificates out in the country, and the gold funds must be kept without infringement to maintain the redemption of these certificates if the holders should call for them.
> Then listen. We have in silver certificates and silver dollars nearly $700,000,000, all of which since 1900 must be redeemed in gold. At least the Government is compelled to keep them at a parity. Add to the greenbacks, to the Treasury notes, to the gold certificates, to the silver certificates, to the silver dollars, an unlimited amount of United States notes—Federal notes—provided in this bill, and where will you get the gold to redeem all of that? That is the question. What provision are you making for the gold?
> Listen, men. Instead of your providing for an increase of gold, you are keeping the gold supply out of this country by a provision in this bill. You say the Treasury note shall be receivable for customs, and customs have always been paid from the beginning in gold in order to supply our gold needed for redemption. Where on earth will you get the gold? You can not pick it off the trees; it can not be found that way. We collect it through the revenue officers in the customhouses of the country; but here, instead of doing with these notes what you did with the greenbacks, what you have done with the national-bank notes, what you really do with the certificates, both gold and silver, you make them acceptable for the payment of customs, whereby every note that you receive in payment of customs will deplete the gold to that degree. While you are providing for an increased demand for gold, if you mean to preserve it as a standard, you are cutting off the real source of its supply.
> Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?
> Mr. FESS. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.
> Mr. BARTLETT. It is true that the national-bank note and the silver certificates can be received now for customs.
> Mr. FESS. The national-bank note can not. I would not say as to the silver certificate, but am inclined to think not.
> Mr. BARTLETT. They pay customs duties now in checks by a recent law.
> Mr. FESS. The checks are redeemable in money which ultimately is gold.
> Now, here is another question that I want to ask the Democratic Members. They will not agree with me in this, but I think it is worth while to think about it. Your tariff measure is professing to collect from imports into the country a large sum of money, and by your competitive system you promise a large increase of importations. If through the Underwood bill you increase the importations to this country to the point, which you might reach, of turning the trade balances against us instead of for us, so that we will be buying more goods from Europe than we are selling, then the balance will have to be settled in gold, the money of international exchange. If you reach that point, th's country will be drained of its gold. Between the two bills, the tariff measure, which provides for an increased importation, and the currency bill, which provides for receiving notes instead of gold for customs duties, between these two plans you are increasing the demand for gold and reducing the supply at both ends.

Mr. Chairman, less than nine months ago I called the attention of this House to a danger growing out of the two Democratic measures—the tariff and currency. I warned you against turning a marvelous balance of trade against us. This balance of trade must be paid in gold. You provided for a greater demand on gold and at the same time you reduced the ability to supply it by a provision in the currency bill. In addition your tariff measure, you were told, might necessitate gold being sent out of the country, and you laughed at my statement when I made it. Now look at the figures. One year ago last April we exported from this country goods worth $54,000,000 more than we imported. In other words, we sold $54,000,000 worth of goods more than we bought. That was under a protective tariff. This April, six months after the Underwood bill took effect, we imported into this country how much? Study these figures. We imported thirty-seven and a half million dollars more than in April a year ago. In April of 1913 the balance of trade was in our favor to the amount of $54,000,000. We imported this April thirty-seven and a half million dollars more than we did a year ago. We exported this year $27,000,000 less in April than we did a year ago. Note the result: The balance of trade in our favor in April, 1913, under the Payne law, was $54,000,000. In April, 1914, it was $10,000,000 against us. That is not all. The flow of gold has reversed and is now toward Europe. Since January 1, 1914, over $31,000,000 in gold have gone out of this country to Europe. For the first time in 20 years we are buying from the foreign producer, employing foreign labor, more than we are selling of American production, employing American labor.

Note the current of business. Our imports are piling up at a dangerous figure. When these imports are analyzed the surprising fact is that imports of raw materials have decreased. The vast increase is in the finished product. That means the raw material once imported to be worked into the finished product by our own labor is now retained in Europe to be worked there into the finished product. That means the labor once employed here to work up the raw material is now shifted from the American workman to the foreign workman. We do not buy the raw material, but we do buy it after it is worked into the finished product. Our exports have greatly fallen off, which means the finished product, once made here by our workmen and sold in the foreign market, is now being increasingly made in the foreign market. There can be but one result. The American producer, employing our own labor, must see his product displaced by the foreign product. If he does not wish to retire from business he has but one alternative, namely, place the wages of this country where he can compete with the wages producing the foreign competitive article. Mr. METZ well said on the floor of this House that hundreds of businesses were today running at a loss to keep their labor employed and their organization intact. This statement from this Democrat of the Empire State is at once true and patriotic, as well as courageous. Last Sunday I was in Youngstown, Ohio. I asked an attorney friend, a Democrat, about the business of his city. He replied, "It is bad. About 50 per cent of our labor is employed."

The business situation can well be discerned by news items taken at random from various quarters of the country. Note a few:

On May 23, there was a deficiency in the general fund of the United States Treasury of $40,007,771, against a surplus of $3,113,815 last year—a difference "to the bad" of $43,121,586.

April imports were $172,640,724, against $146,194,461 in April, 1913. Domestic exports in April were $158,996,394, a decrease of $37,237,312 as compared with April, 1913. The excess of the imports over exports in April was $10,271,872.

Gross earnings of United States railroads making weekly returns to Dun's Review continue in moderate volume, the total so far for the first two weeks of May amounting to $12,616,493, a decrease of 7.4 per cent, as compared with the earnings of the same roads for the corresponding period a year ago.

The New York Sun gives a succinct statement of the situation in the following words:

Six months experiment with President Wilson's recipe for "sharpening the wits of American manufacturers" by opening our doors to the manufacturers of other parts of the world has given four very definite results:

First. An increase in importations of manufactures.
Second. A slowing down of our own factories.
Third. A falling off of the exports of manufactures.
Fourth. A falling off in revenues.

The official record for the first half year of the tariff law's operation is now available, the Department of Commerce's statement of imports and exports for the month of March completing the following figures for the six months.

INCREASED IMPORTS OF MANUFACTURES.

Imports of manufactures have materially increased, the quantity of manufacturers' material drawn from abroad has been greatly reduced, exports of the products of American manufacturers have fallen off, and the receipts from customs are far below the normal.

The value of finished manufactures imported in the six months' operation of the law, October 1 to April 1, is $228,000,000 against $215,000,000 in the same period of last year; the value of manufacturers' material imported is $469,000,000 against $517,000,000 in the corresponding months of last year; the value of manufactures exported is $541,000,000 against $582,000,000 in the like period of last year, and the receipts from customs are but $140,000,000 against $165,000,000 in the same months of last year.

A MOUNTING DEFICIT.

Meantime the deficit in the Treasury accounts continues to mount, yesterday's official statement showing the "excess of ordinary disbursements" for the fiscal year $37,097,955, against an excess of revenue receipts of $7,395,700 for the same period of last year, when the much berated Payne tariff was in operation, or, to put it in ordinary terms, a deficit of $37,000,000 this fiscal year against a surplus of $7,333,000 at this time last year. Of course, the administration is depending on the income tax to pull it out of the hole.

In every month of the period in which the new law has been industriously "sharpening the wits of American manufacturers" by bringing in foreign manufactures at reducted rates of duty the customs receipts have fallen below those of the corresponding period of last year.

MORE FINISHED IMPORTS, LESS MATERIALS.

In five of the six months the imports of finished manufactures have exceeded those of the same months of the preceding year; and in four of the six months the imports of manufacturers' materials and the exports of manufactures have fallen short of the record of the corresponding months of last year.

True, the first month of the new law did show on its face a lower valuation of manufactures imported than in the same month of the preceding year, but this was due to the fact that much of this class of merchandise had been imported and placed in warehouse in the preceding month, thus appearing in the import records of September, while the goods in fact entered in October under the new law. In every other month of the period the imports of finished manufactures is greater than in the same months of last year.

A PROGRESIVE INCREASE.

This increase in the imports of finished manufactures has been progressive. The closing month of the period showed also larger total imports than any other, $183,000,000, against $133,000,000 in its first month. On the other hand, the exports of domestic products have steadily fallen, the figures for October, 1913, having been $269,000,000 and in March, 1914, only $184,000,000. This seems to illustrate the fallacy of the Democratic theory that "if you don't buy, you can't sell."

The imports in the six months increased more than 37 per cent, while the exports decreased more than 31 per cent in the same period.

It is in the persistent fall in the importation of manufacturers' materials, however, that there is the gravest concern. No part of the machinery of the Government gives such excellent opportunity to measure the activities of the manufacturers of the country as does the record of the imports of their requirements for manufacturing and of the manufactures which come in competition with them.

NOT DUE TO LOWER PRICES.

It can not be said that the fall in value of manufacturers' materials imported is due to lower prices An examination of the detailed records of the period shows in many cases much smaller quantities of the various materials brought in.

The total quantity of raw cotton imported in the six months under the new law is only 51,000,000 pounds, against 79,000,000 pounds in the same period of last year; pig tin for use in the tin-plate factories, 37,000,000 pounds, against 46,000,000; hides and skins, 280,000,000 pounds, against 295,000,000; rubber, 62,000,000 pounds, against 63,000,000, and in many other articles of this class there is a like falling off in quantity imported.

In those articles of manufacture in which the duty was reduced in order to "sharpen the wits" of their producers at home, there has been a striking increase in importation and in most cases a corresponding decrease in exportation, due, apparently, to a slowing down in production by our manufacturers.

In tin plate, for example, in which the duty was decreased about one-third, the imports of the six months under the new tariff were more than 33,000,000 pounds, against less than 3,000,000 in the six months of last year, an increase of 1,000 per cent, while the exports fell from 74,000,000 pounds in the six months of last year to 43,000,000 pounds in the six months under the new law.

LEATHER AND COTTON.

In leather and its manufactures, in which the duties were either removed or largely reduced, the imports increased more than 40 per cent, while the exports declined about 15 per cent.

In cotton manufactures, on which there was a reduction of duties, the imports show an increase of nearly $5,000,000, while the exports show a falling off in total value, despite the fact that the Department of Commerce is industriously tooting its horn about the wonderful work it is doing in finding markets for our cotton goods.

Duties on iron and steel manufactures were reduced and the exports of iron and steel manufactures have fallen $30,000,000 in the six months' period.

Meantime the talk about increased supplies of food and reduced prices through removal of duties on foodstuffs is making manifest its real qualities. The records of the six months show an importation of 83,000,000 pounds of fresh beef in that period, or about 2 ounces a month for each individual in the United States.

The official records of the Department of Commerce show that prices at which the importation occurred were more than 30 per cent higher in March under the new law than in September, the last month of the old law, while on many other of the articles on which duties were reduced the prices abroad were promptly advanced.

This is not confined to the manufacturer. It is bound to reach the American farmer in an increasingly hurtful result. Note the items of interest to the farmer.

Last week Argentine corn was offered in Chicago for June and July shipments.

The New York Times noted a sharp decline of exports from the United States to the South American countries in the early part of the year, but unprecedented importations of corn, fresh beef, cattle, hides, and wool.

Does it take a prophet to foretell what the American farmer will say at his earliest opportunity what his opinion is of such a policy or a party supporting such a policy?

He does not relish such news items as this:

One day last week a steamer from Liverpool, England, brought to Philadelphia 103,000 pounds of Argentine beef and 360,000 frozen eggs which had come all the way from China.

The situation of the Treasury is not encouraging with a deficit of $40,000,000 in the revenues in the last six months of the fiscal year. No one can yet tell what the income tax will bring forth. We now hear some mutterings that the tariff is to be restored upon sugar, an industry that is destined to probable total destruction unless some relief is forthcoming. I take this from a Washington dispatch to the Cincinnati Enquirer:

WASHINGTON, May 31.

The administration, facing a Treasury deficit and fearing destruction of both cane and beet sugar industry through free sugar, is about to reverse its free-sugar policy by amending the Underwood tariff law to retain a duty of 1 cent a pound on sugar.

It is estimated such a duty will yield to the Federal Treasury annually about $37,000,000. The Treasury is now running short on revenues about $500,000 a day while awaiting collections from the income tax and other sources. It is the opinion of both sugar-cane growers in Louisiana and sugar-beet growers in Colorado that the 1 cent a pound duty will permit those industries to survive. It is contended still that they will not be profitable except under the most favorable economic conditions.

Acting for the Democratic administration, Secretary Redfield, of the Department of Commerce, has had experts make a study in Louisiana of the actual cost of raising sugar cane and of its reduction into raw sugar. The Louisiana sugar planters insisted that free sugar would make it impossible for them to compete with Cuban-grown sugar cane. Many of them went out of the sugar-cane growing business, and sugar plantations are now on the market selling for nominal prices.

Even Untermyer, whose utterances are the final word for this administration, has admitted that business is bad. When the Representatives of my State and that of Illinois, representing at least 30,000 employers employing 1,000,000 men and an industry amounting to three-quarters of a billion dollars, asked the President to suspend further legislation that business might get on its feet, the President's reply was that the business situation is psychologic. It was a state of mind. The Philadelphia Ledger then put the pertinent query:

Can an extra dose of psychology give back to 2,000,000 railroad owners that $98,000,000 which their properties have lost in eight months this fiscal year, compared with the year before the Wilson régime started?

Is it only a dream or a concrete fact that 1,000,000 workmen are now out of a job?

Can a mental state account for the amazing reversal in America's international trade figures, where a monthly excess of exports ranging up to $50,000,000 has turned into a balance against us of $10,000,000 for April?

Does mere sentiment reduce our steel mill output to 60 per cent of its capacity? Was it hysteria that blew out 15,000 Pennsylvania coke ovens?

No; it was not a "merely psychological" notion that unloaded American-made traffic from 230,000 freight cars and put them out of commission. Baldwin's didn't discharge more than half their employees out of pique.

Building operations in the United States have not fallen greatly simply to create political sentiment. Our bankers are not sending shiploads of gold to Europe to spite somebody.

When securities have been liquidated in 18 months to a level $2,000,000,000 below their former value the country is not suffering psychologically, but concretely.

It is an outrageous mockery for those whose excessive legislative meddling is largely responsible for our present trade ills to pretend that the people who have suffered the loss and who are out of work are themselves to blame.

The President says there is "nothing more dangerous for business than uncertainty." But his party has left business in no uncertainty whatever, except as to the extent of the calamity which it may inflict.

One of the best business barometers is the idle car surplus. The following comparison of the first six months of 1913, when still under a protective system, with the first six months under the Underwood bill will be enlightening.

AMERICAN RAILWAY ASSOCIATION REPORTS A NET SURPLUS OF 238,642 CARS ON MAY 15.

Following is a table showing the surpluses and shortages in the last year at various recent dates:

Mr. Chairman, this situation of the country in the first six months of the Underwood tariff will not be greatly relieved by the promise of the most bountiful harvest of crops ever known. This feature will assist but it will not relieve the situation.

Democrats may call us calamity howlers; they may ridicule the recital of facts; but whistling to keep up courage is not a substitute for confidence. The President may declare it a mere state of mind, but even Christian Science, whatever spiritual efficacy it may possess, does not claim to dominate the laws of trade.

Cabinet members may indict us as "little thinkers," but innuendo or epithet will not restore the prosperous condition of our people of 1912.

Statesmen may declare the depression is world-wide; but that does not answer the query, Why is it coincident in this country with Democratic administration?

No. Mr. Chairman, it would be wise for the Congress to adjourn and give the country a rest.

I now repeat what I said on April 25, 1913, when I declared that the Underwood bill ought to be entitled "An act in the interest of foreign countries as against the United States." I then declared that if the bill passed history would repeat itself; that the only way the Democrats would reduce the cost of living would be to destroy the purchasing power of the consumer.

I leave it to any fair-minded citizen whether history is not repeating itself; whether the cost of living will be reduced by this administration except by disruption of business.

While the leaders of this administration attempt to make believe that it is only a mental state, I now warn them that by the time the ides of November appear a new awakening will come. Ere that time the people of the country will have spoken. I am perfectly willing to leave it with them; and I am sure I but repeat the real situation when again I say the most anxious moment of the people of this Nation is that glad time when they can issue the order of dismissal to the majority party now oppressing the industrial life of the Nation. I have no doubt of the issue.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have Members here, it seems, for all purposes. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHBROOK. General purposes?

Mr. HEFLIN. A gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has been occupying a seat on that side, who came here recently for the sole purpose, it appears, of keeping tab on the membership of this side——

Mr. ADAMSON. A timekeeper.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; he has constituted himself the official timekeeper, or political record writer, of the remnant of Republicans now left in the House. [Laughter.] I would like to know of the gentleman how he kept up with the attendance of the House on the day that he was at the ball game. [Laughter.] I would like to know if the gentleman would insert in his speech the situation that we see here now, with 80 Democrats——

A MEMBER. Eighty-five——

Mr. HEFLIN. Eighty-five Democrats and 18 Republicans and Progressives altogether. [Laughter and applause.]

A MEMBER. Thirteen——

Mr. HEFLIN. Thirteen. Worse and worse. [Laughter.]

Let me remind the gentleman from Ohio that he will have trouble in explaining back home just how 14 Democrats could outvote the entire Republican membership of this House. Somebody will ask where were the Republican Members. [Laughter and applause.]

"Why was it that you did not get certain provisions in the bill?" they will ask you. "If you Republicans were there, you could watch your opportunity and when you caught the Democrats napping you could put your amendments over." But where were the Republicans——

A MEMBER. At the ball game. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. On the two or three occasions mentioned by the gentleman there were more Democrats here than Republicans? The gentleman knows that when these bills are introduced, Members see them, and when the committees act upon these bills and report them, and when the reports are printed, the Members read them, and they know just what is in the bill; and often during general debate on the measure they do not all of them remain in the Hall to hear the speeches; but the gentleman knows that whenever they are needed to pass the bill they are right here to vote.

It is true that this side is responsible for legislation, and I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that when we finally leave this Hall at the end of this session, with an income tax upon the statute books, with a tariff for revenue only upon the statute books, with a banking and currency law upon the statute books, and with the trusts of this country regulated in the interest of justice and fair dealing, the gentleman may look for an overwhelming Democratic majority in the fall election. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the man who sits at yonder end of the Avenue in the White House, the people of the country will say to him and to us, "Well done, thou good and faithful servants." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to proceed further now?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not know how far afield this discussion will be permitted to go. I think it has already gone to some distance remote from the bill itself which is now under consideration. But I am reminded of the fact that the Democratic Party accounts itself responsible for what is done here, and properly so, though it is generally regarded as simply an agent "ungrudgingly" doing what is directed to be done from the other end of the Avenue.

We were reminded to-day by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] of the differences between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party and the Progressive Party, of which he said I was a little leader [laughter], thereby doing me altogether too much credit, and it seems to me that this is a good time to consider—at least, I am desirous of the opportunity to place before this House—what I regard as the fundamental differences between these parties.

Mr. Chairman, I find at page 4382 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech purporting to have been delivered in this House by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] when the appropriation for the Department of Agriculture was under consideration. It is labeled, "The Future of the Progressive Party."

It is greatly to be regretted that the distinguished author, who always delights the House with the graces of his utterances, embalmed his "prophecies" in the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, although there they will doubtless serve as a campaign document equally well as though they had been actually delivered in the House.

The speech is evidently designed as a coat of whitewash for the present leaders of the Republican Party, who control its methods and policies, and would serve admirably as a bid for the Republican nomination for governor of Ohio if the gentleman has ambitions in that way. [Laughter and applause.]

But Republican leadership needs disinfectants, not whitewash. [Laughter.]

The gullibility of the average college president when he takes a hand in politics is generally recognized by the astute leaders of the boss system, and they are constantly "setting springes to catch woodcock." [Laughter.]

The boss system feels most nowadays the need of "respectability," and in the learned professions, especially those most remote from practical experiences and activities, they secure "respectability" by inducing men of the character of Chancellor Day of the Syracuse University, President Butler of Columbia University, President Fess of Antioch College, and gentlemen of like high personal character and political credulity, to become their advocates, apologists, and adherents. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. No; my time is very short; I hope the gentleman will excuse me. The speech abounds in much learning, in specious argument, and false logic. The gentleman's prophecies will surely cause his "clients" to smile at his ardor in their defense and gratefully to acknowledge the cloak of respectability with which he drapes the pirates who have seized the organization of the Republican Party. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. Good! That is right.

Mr. HULINGS. The learning displayed is interesting and abundant, but the reader of the speech will be at a loss to reconcile some of its statements.

In one paragraph the gentleman says "the Republican Party owes its rise and growth to no single issue." In the next paragraph he says "the rise of the Republican Party was wholly due to the attitude of the leading parties upon the all-embracing issue before the people," the "inherent wrong of the traffic in human beings."

The speech is designed to show that third-party movements never succeed, or, more specifically, that the Progressive movement can not succeed.

And then he gives his reasons. He says third-party movements contain these prominent elements:

1. Young men who know their ability and truly discern the motives of the leaders, and, discerning, abandon faithless leaders(?).
2. Reformers.
3. The clergy and the scholar in politics.
4. Discredited leaders.
5. Soreheads.
6. A class whose chief motive is to punish its party; those whose unsettled minds are a fertile field for the cheap magazine, with its penny-a-line articles of protest.
7. Citizens who feed their "distrust upon the food of popular magazines" and "mutterings of suspicion."

These, according to the honorable gentleman, furnish a large portion of all third-party movements—of course referring particularly to the Progressive Party—and the conclusion, of course, is that it can not succeed.

But the Republican Party was a third party. It contained "preeminently" these elements, and logically, therefore, could not succeed. But as a matter of fact it did succeed, and it succeeded because the gentleman's philosophy and fine "writin'" is not true. It succeeded precisely for the same reason that the Progressive Party will succeed, and that is because it rose from the hearts of the people when the old party leaders no longer responded to the public will. [Applause.]

In all these movements, whatever number of the people leave an old party, taking with them the jealousies, disappointments, selfishness, suspicion, and "unsettled minds" that the gentleman insists compose third-party movements, they naturally take back with them when they return to the old party. If the gentleman is correct, would not the old party be better without them? Why, then, this anxiety that they should return? If the old party has gotten rid of the cranks and the soreheads, why do they want them back? [Laughter.]

According to his view the people who remain in the old party monopolize the wisdom and patriotism and "settled minds." But how is it when the boot is on the other foot?

Suppose party leaders, usurping the tremendous power of a great national party organization, build up a system, with its ramifications in every State, county, and township, buttressed and supported by enormous official patronage and by a great party newspaper press, financed by the trusts, the railroad, the banking, and other great business organizations whose interests it serves; suppose, in short, that the iniquitous "boss system," as it is known of all men "slates" all candidates from President down to poundmaster and uses the tremendous power of the "machine" to elect them, making the "system" autocratic in the party and intolerant of public demands; and suppose in such case the bulk of the party, the youth, the thinkers, the readers, the scholars, the reformers, the dissatisfied, rise in mass and leave the party, as 4,200,000 of them left the Republican Party in 1912, proving beyond all doubt by this unprecedented movement, country wide in extent, that the party had failed to satisfy the people or to respond to the public will, what do they gain by a return to the party, under the same discredited leadership, that continues to flout these demands, regarding them as the "frenzy of the mob"?

The gentleman makes a brilliant defense of the protective tariff, which has been overturned by the Democratic Party, but he fails to say that this overthrow was the result of the long-continued practice of the boss system to use the protective tariff to deal out special privileges to big business, and by the failure to keep promises made to the people to reduce the tariff to proper protective schedules. If the Republican bosses had kept faith with the people there would have been no division in the party, no Democratic victory, and no assault upon the protective tariff.

It is impossible to enact a proper tariff law, involving thousands of kinds of goods, when the legislator must vote yea or nay in gross for all in a single bill, always with scant information. The only rational way is to consider each schedule alone, after full information has been laid before Congress by a nonpartisan scientific expert commission.

This is the ground taken by the Progressive Party which for this very reason makes it a better protective-tariff party than the Republican Party. The Progressive Party is thoroughly committed to the protective-tariff policy, while in the present Congress both the Republican and Democratic Parties voted against the nonpartisan commission proposed by the Progressive Party, and among the opponents of this rational common-sense measure the distinguished gentleman from Ohio was found.

The gentleman's tributes to Lincoln and the Republican Party are quite aside from the mark.

It is quite unthinkable that Lincoln, if living, would be found in the company of PENROSE, Barnes, SMOOT, Guggenheim, Crane, ROOT, and men like them who, in the broad light of day, overthrew the plain will of the people at Chicago in 1912 and for years had been secretly doing the same thing. [Applause.]

The off-hand dictum of the gentleman that "the leaders invariably reflect the conviction of the people," like most of his conclusions, simply is not true. [Laughter and applause.] If it was true third-party movements never would occur, and neither the Republican nor Progressive Parties would ever have been organized. There would have been no excuse for a revolt.

The Sherman antitrust law was never intended by the bosses of either party to become operative. For many years it was a dead letter, until Theodore Roosevelt gave it vitality in spite of the wild clamor of the special interests and their subsidized press that he was "disturbing business." The exposures in insurance and banking circles and the Beef, Sugar, Tobacco, Oil, and Railroad Trusts, and the revelations of the "working arrangements" between big politicians and big business created a frightful stench. It was called muckraking, as a term of reproach by those who had no reprobation for the corruption exposed. It did disturb business. Prosecutions have been ineffective. The antitrust laws need amendment; but again the cry is heard from stand-pat leaders and the press of both parties, "You are disturbing business," "Persecution," "Give business a rest." And so the proposed amendments by the Democratic administration would treat the predatory trusts very gingerly and "very nicely."

But it was precisely because Roosevelt did not treat the "interests" nicely that he was opposed by them. He had the whole country behind him, but he was confronted by the opposition of the "leaders" of the Republican Party and their bipartisan allies. He was turned down by them at Chicago and hated by them ever since, not because he was not a good tariff man, not because he was not a good Republican, but because he attacked the citadel of special interests, which was "garrisoned" and defended by the leaders.

For more than a generation the people protested against the iniquity of rebates and discriminations in railroad freights; valiantly did the railroads and the "leaders" oppose legal regulation. After a law was enacted, efforts to render it nugatory were never relinquished, and no sooner was Mr. Taft elected than he signalized his surrender to big business and the "leaders" by proposing an administration bill which, if passed, would have been a substantial repeal of the laws regulating railroads, and the "leaders" would have succeeded in enacting the law except for the opposition of some of the "unsettled minds" and "insurgents," who were read out of the party by the "leaders" and put on the patronage black list by President Taft for their opposition. [Applause.]

The gentleman holds a possible gubernatorial nomination and the good will of the "leaders" too close to his eye to get a true view of the situation. His belittling of the Progressive Party and his defense of the corrupt leadership that split the Republican Party in twain is a performance that an artist would call a "pot boiler." It is not the best work he can do, but it is the kind of work that will best serve the present plight of Republican leadership.

Beyond all question, if the people had not been robbed at Chicago of their right to name the candidate of their choice, the platform of the Republican Party would have been substantially the platform on which the Progressive Party now stands.

The people favor the things for which that party stands. No other proof of this is needed than the fact that large elements in the old parties call themselves Progressive Democrats and Progressive Republicans; and even the standpatters, the stipendiaries of privilege, the "kept" editors, and the very high priests of the boss system are now finding the erstwhile despised Progressive doctrines so popular that they are lustily claiming that they themselves are the only Simon-pure Progressives.

Every man cherishing the Republicanism of Abraham Lincoln can join the Progressive Party without the surrender of a single tenet of his beliefs. He abandons nothing except a leadership that wrecked his party and disgraced its name. [Applause.]

The Progressive recognizes that the chief function of government is the mutual protection and helpfulness of all. His face is set against the boss system, which plunders the many that a few may flourish.

The difference between the Progressive Party and the Republican leaders is fundamental. The Progressive Party believes that the people are of right the source of all power in government. The right of the people to rule is the bedrock of American liberties and the foundation of the Progressive movement in America.

The Republican leaders believe that this is a Government by a "representative class" that knows better than the people what the people ought to have.

Now, the beliefs of the boss system, if it can be said to have any moral perceptions [laughter], never stand in the way of anything necessary to achieve its purposes, but it pretends to believe that the people are really incapable of self-government and must be muzzled lest they bite themselves. [Laughter.]

The fact is that "government by a representative class," called more properly by the shorter name "the boss system," is utterly unrepublican. It is actually "class" government, that always has and always will use the powers of government for the advantage of the "class." And that is precisely what all the trouble is about. [Applause.]

This, as I conceive it, is the vital reason why Progressives should not return to the Republican Party while it is dominated and controlled by leaders who do not, as the gentleman fondly believes, "invariably reflect the conviction of the people," but who do not even believe the people have intelligent convictions. [Applause.]

The basis of my hope for the success of the Progressive Party is that the rank and file of all parties need no argument to convince them of the crying need of political reforms, will come to realize the futility of the hope of securing these reforms by voting the old party ticket for candidates "slated" by the boss system and sooner or later will see in the destruction of that hateful system their chief public duty and, as practical men, will join the Progressive Party.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HULINGS. I would like about five or six minutes more.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. HULINGS. A world-wide social movement is stirring every civilized country to the depths. You find it in England, you find it in Germany, you find it in Australia, and all over the world. It is the awakening of an enlightened democracy; it is the quest of humanity for betterments; it is the groping, searching, yearning of mankind for an enlarged social justice; it is the recognition by the plain people of their rights and their might; that class legislation is social injustice, robbing the masses of a fair share of the products of labor and depriving the people who do the real work of the world of an equitable division of the advantages and ameliorations of civilization.

It is a great evolutionary development of man's equality and brotherhood. The fundamental purpose of all society, all government, is mutual protection and helpfulness. This is the heart and soul of the progressive movement in all lands. The "classes" for centuries have muzzled the masses. This movement proposes to muzzle the wolves of society.

This great movement is confusing and disrupting party lines in all foreign countries. The same effect is seen in our own country. Disorganization and realignment is going on in both the old parties. Irreconcilable elements are found in both.

Men call themselves Democrats who have nothing in common. The fact that they distinguish themselves as Bryan Democrats and Murphy Democrats, as progressive Democrats and standpat Democrats proves the process of realignment.

In the Republican Party standpat Republicans and progressive Republicans have nothing in common. PENROSE and CUMMINS both call themselves Republicans, but they are as far apart as Wilson and Murphy, who both call themselves Democrats.

The rank and file of the old parties by a vast majority believe in the progressive doctrines, but it is idle to expect them to be adopted by a party that is half standpat and half progressive.

The Progressive Party is the only party that is unitedly and consistently progressive.

It sets out a great program of social reforms that are dear to the hearts of the people, and it alone offers the hope that they will be realized.

Gentlemen need not deceive themselves. This great, swift-moving evolution can not be sidetracked. As surely as the "rivers run to the seas" there will be a realignment of parties. On the one side will be a liberal progressive successful party, that will move with the present, that will grasp from the future by the hand of faith and endeavor better things in life and government than we now dream of, and on the other side will be a standpat reactionary party, that may be useful as the necessary brake.

What the name of this great successful party shall be matters little to the people. The substance of these reforms and not party names concern them.

But whatever name it is known by, it must be a party that is all progressive, and at present there is only one such party. The Progressive Party is already blazing the way, which the leaders of both the old parties, though at heart despising the Progressive Party and its doctrines, are haltingly and grudgingly following step by step.

Party organization is essential in republican forms of government. Without it the necessary concert of action can not be secured. With it naturally goes leadership. But long continued in power, the leaders are prone to become arrogant, self-sufficient, maintaining themselves in power, long after they have ceased "to reflect the convictions of the people" by an unscrupulous use of money and machine politics, and government not by the people, but by the "boss system," is the result.

This is the trouble with the Republican leadership. It has not kept step with public sentiment. It has chosen instead the road to political death. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HULINGS. The Democratic Party, now in power through a division of the opposition, burdened now by the responsibilities of a dominant party, is pursuing precisely the same methods that divided the Republican Party, and which will inevitably divide it.

Upon the great questions—the tariff, civil service, trust control, railroad regulation, monopolies, social justice, the right of the people to rule—the old parties are torn and divided in factions; only in pernicious use of the caucus, the gag, secret committees, and the boss system do they agree.

No man can choose either of them and be sure of what he is getting. The powerful indictment of the Democratic Party by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] for the arrogant use of the "gag rule" and the "secret caucus" saw the Democrats sit speechless. The Congress has ceased to be a really deliberative body. It goes through the motions of debate and consumes time in sham discussions of measures that are predetermined by a single mind. Instead of "pitiless publicity" we have had the most secretive administration known to American politics. Democratic Members of important committees never knew what bills they would report until the party boss issued his orders.

When the party boss gave his orders that we should have no more rights in the Panama Canal than any other nation, except the right to pay the bills, he gave no reasons. When he demanded that our markets be thrown open to foreign manufacturers, on the plea that it would reduce the cost of living, it was a grave mistake.

To provide places for Democratic officeholders the Democratic Party violated the civil-service reform in three distinct assaults. Our Diplomatic Service has fallen—I do not like to say into disgrace—into doubt.

Mr. ALLEN. The River of Doubt. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULINGS. The American flag is no longer a protection to American citizens in foreign lands. The spectacle of an American fleet of warships sailing from Tampico and leaving nearly 2,000 American men, women, and children to seek and get protection from a British warship should cause every American cheek to blush with shame.

The Progressive Party alone is united, keeping step with enlightened, progressive public sentiment.

The bulk of all parties is just as desirous of good government, just as honest and sincere as the Progressives can be. They continue to vote their old party ticket, conscious that things are wrong, but earnestly hoping for reforms within the party, failing to see that by following leaders that do not believe in "government by the people" they are losing the substance of reforms by supporting the "machine" that makes reforms impossible.

The Democratic "machine" cries "Stick to your party or the Republicans may win." The Republican "machine" cries "Come back into the party or the Democrats will win again." This is the strongest plea the Republican leaders can make, for the general public is sick of the Democratic tariff and wants a protective tariff, but the general public is not likely to forget that these same leaders so abused the tariff when they controlled it that the general public put a majority of Democrats in this House before there was a Progressive Party.

The Progressive Party makes a better plea. It believes in a protective tariff, but it wants an honest tariff, and no logrolling and special privileges. It stands for what the people have demanded for years. It is at war with the entire boss system. It believes in government by the people; it believes that through governmental agencies a larger measure of social justice can be secured; it believes that it is the business of the Government to see that the powerful do not oppress the weak; that the weak and the average man are protected from the strong.

It believes in newer and better things; it believes in endeavor and progress; it believes in itself and the great American people and their capacity to maintain a cleaner and a wiser Government. And for these things the true Progressive will stand firm. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, we have listened this evening, as this House is frequently called upon to listen, to a one-sided, unfair presentation from a partisan standpoint of matters transpiring here and in the Nation by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. This evening he carefully read statistics as to the attendance on this side of the House during these long speeches, when very few feel like attending, and carefully refrained from reading any statistics as to the much smaller attendance on that side of the House. I have noticed that during the progress of legislation in this House when the vital time comes to overcome those tendencies and influences that have dominated this country for 16 years under the Republican Party he finds, and the country finds, every Democrat here in his seat, on guard back of the banners of Democracy, seeing that real Democratic principles prevail and win in the battles on this floor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

He quoted carefully the statistics as to imports and exports during the month of April of this year. He did not discover these statistics; he did not dig them out. They were figures quoted in the Senate a few days ago by Senator SMOOT. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] quoted them again on this floor without paying the slightest attention to the complete reply made to Senator SMOOT by the Secretary of Commerce. Here is what Secretary Redfield had to say about Senator SMOOT's figures, which Senator SMOOT presented a little while ago in the Senate, and which the gentleman from Ohio presented here this evening as discoveries of his own.

Secretary Redfield, in reply to Senator SMOOT, said:

> Looking back to the last time when imports exceeded exports, we discover that it was while the Payne-Aldrich law was in effect that this event took place.
> The trade balance in our favor during the 10 months ending with April, 1910, was $170,931,416, or over $300,000,000 less than during the 10 months ending with the present April. Not only so, but during the first year of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law five months showed the imports in excess of the exports, and one of these months—March, 1910—showed an excess of imports of $19,341,578.
> Any statement as to the effects of a tariff based upon figures for six or eight months is necessarily illusive; but if the present tariff is to be judged that way and condemned because of the excess of imports in one month since its passage, what shall be said of the Payne law when in a like period after it came into effect there were three months in which the imports exceeded exports? And in one of these that excess was nearly double that about which so much is now said.

It is true of tariff making in this country that it frequently happens that there are some months soon after the new bill goes into effect when the imports exceed the exports. For some months there is a balance of trade against us. That is probably due to the fact that importers bring here foreign goods and manufacturers of foreign goods are seeking under new tariff conditions to establish in this country, where tariff rates have been changed, a new trade for themselves. We have tried to place on the statute books a tariff for revenue only in accordance with the principles of the Democratic Party.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. RAINEY. As I said, Mr. Chairman, we have tried to place on the statute books a tariff for revenue only and we have succeeded. We have not tried, as the Republican Party has in their tariff laws, to protect the profits of the manufacturers in this country, and we have not done so. We have not injured them in any way. They are manufacturing just as much as they ever manufactured. We are consuming more and more every day in this country than we ever consumed before. We have succeeded in our attempts. At the close of business to-day we had collected within $100,000 of as much money as we expected to collect at our ports of entry during this entire fiscal year. [Applause.] In other words, at the going down of the sun to-morrow night, if we did not collect another dollar at our ports of entry from that time until the last day of this month, we would have collected as much money as we expected to collect under the estimates furnished by the Ways and Means Committee on the last day of this month. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Underwood bill is what we tried to make it—a tariff for revenue only. We have wiped out every vestige of the old war tariff, and we will find on the last day of this month that we have collected at our ports of entry $20,000,000 more than we expected we would have collected on that day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Customs receipts for the present fiscal year under the new tariff law will exceed the committee estimates by $20,000,000. For every one of the 25 working days during the month of May we collected over $832,000.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. What is the reason for the depression in business to-day?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is in the minds of the Republicans.

Mr. RAINEY. The reason for the depression in business is that it is world-wide. There is a readjustment of conditions the world over, and there is in certain lines of industry a depression in business. It is more imaginary than real, due to just such speeches as the gentleman from Ohio is capable of making. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. No; I can not yield longer, for I have not the time.

Mr. FESS. Why is it in Democratic times?

Mr. RAINEY. The depression in business is general all over the world. It is felt less here than in other parts of the world. It would not be noticed here at all if it were not for the efforts of Republican politicians to convince the country that there is a business depression.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I have not the time. If I can get more time, I will be glad to yield later to the gentleman. Just a few months ago we heard of a great army of unemployed gathering in various parts of this country ready to march in overwhelming numbers upon this Capital, demanding work for the starving laborers of this country. The general in command of the army lived in the gentleman's own State, and he started from there.

Mr. FESS. And he is a Democrat.

Mr. RAINEY. He is a prophet of calamity, as is also the gentleman from Ohio. He attempted to gather together his hosts from all over the country, and once in a while we heard that straggling bands of recruits were coming to join his army. A few days ago they arrived here in the city, and I, with some others upon this side of the House, went out to interview this tremendous army of unemployed. We found that it consisted of seven men, one woman, and a mule. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] All the rest of them had yielded to the seductive opportunities for employment on the route and were at work. Finally this magnificent army marched up the center steps of the Capitol and this distinguished general from the gentleman's own State, the twin prophet of calamity with the gentleman who just interrupted me, made his speech out there on the steps in front of the Capitol.

Talk about the tariff law not being successful, talk about approaching hard times! I will tell the gentleman what is approaching now. Down in Oklahoma and for a thousand miles across parallels of latitude the northward march of the self-binder is commencing; and I advise the gentleman to tell his friends who are out of employment to go down to Oklahoma and to Nebraska and to Missouri and to Illinois, and we will give them all work in our wheat fields at $2.50 and $3 a day. [Applause.]

On 46,000,000 acres the wheat is ripening under the summer sun. We are producing this year not an ordinary crop of wheat, but a bumper crop of wheat. Soon our granaries will be filled to bursting with the garnered grain. In the great wheat fields of the West there is work enough for all at from $2.50 to $3 per day during all of the summer months and almost until the frost comes. I am aware that this is not good news for Gen. Coxey and the gentleman from Ohio and all those others who delight in prophesying hard times under a Democratic administration. We all recall the events which occurred during the recent Republican panic of 1907. On every hand was heard the crash of failing banks. Can the gentlemen on the other side of this House call attention to failing banks at the present time?

Our exports have held their own in spite of the fact that we have almost ceased to be an exporter of corn, our greatest agricultural product. Last year there was a shortage of nearly 700,000,000 bushels, and the exportation of that product has almost ceased.

No man can criticize this Democratic Congress upon the theory that it has failed in its duty to the country. We are able to call attention to the following remedial legislation, all of which has passed the lower House of Congress, and the greater part of which is written into law. We have enacted in the short period we have been in control more legislation in the interest of labor than the Republican Party ever accomplished or even attempted to accomplish during the entire period of its supremacy, the lowest tariff law written since the war, an income-tax system demanded by the people for a quarter of a century, one of the most effective parcel post systems in the world which has already compelled important reductions in express rates, the opening up of Alaska, Government aid for roads, election of Senators by direct vote of the people, effective campaign publicity measures, the reforming of our currency legislation. We submit that this is a record of performance, of promises kept, not equaled by the Republican Party during its entire existence as a party, and we have but just entered upon the period of Democratic control.

Our income tax did not become effective until March 1 of this year. It was not expected that payments would be made until after the first day of the present month, and yet men subject to the payment of an income tax commenced to pay long before the first day of this month. Up to the end of May we had collected on our corporation and income taxes $10,557,221.31. We are collecting more corporation taxes than have been collected before. Our miscellaneous receipts are about the same as they always have been. Our internal revenue, exclusive of corporation and income tax, at the end of the present fiscal year will about reach the average figure, from two hundred and ninety to three hundred million dollars. When we placed on the statute books the Underwood tariff law we estimated that the receipts for the fiscal year, which ends with the last day in the present month, would be slightly over $270,000,000. When the sun goes down to-morrow night we will have collected at our ports over $270,000,000, and there will remain yet 23 working days in the present fiscal year, on each one of which the revenues collected at our ports ought to be nearly a million dollars. I might also call attention to the fact that since our Post Office Department has been under Democratic control the postal deficiency has been reduced from $463,874.31 to $686.34. The country will be satisfied at the end of this fiscal year with our stewardship. We have kept the faith. From the strongholds of trusts and law-defying corporations, accustomed to profit at the expense of the people by legislation passed by this body, come the only murmurs of discontent and disapproval.

Carrying out the traditions and the history of the Republican Party in recent years, its leaders upon this floor are giving voice to the disapproval coming from these sources. We have not tried to obtain the approval of that class of business in this country which asks special favors from this body at the expense of the great mass of the consumers of the country. We have been true to the principles of the Democratic Party and the teachings of its great leaders. As a unit both Houses of the Congress have stood back of the Democratic administration and have made it possible to enact into law these great measures. We propose to continue true to Democratic theories, keeping our pledges to the last, proceeding in the course we have laid out. We have confidence in the man at the wheel. We know how to avoid the rocks. We do not fear the storms. In the sky the sun is shining. A new day is here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE].

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, laws are necessary in order to restrain those who would take an undue advantage of their fellows.

He who would reap where he has not sown by extorting from his fellow man by means of monopoly or combination in restraint of trade violates a principle of justice for which he should pay a penalty and be enjoined from a repetition of such practices. In modern commercial and industrial life, with all its complexities, intricate and far-reaching ramifications, it is possible for an ingenious and evil-minded business man to so cover his tracks that the ordinary individual may not be able to discover wherein the rights of the masses are being encroached upon. From the dawn of civilization to the present time the evil inclinations in the breasts of some men have ever prompted them to take undue advantage of others, and this will continue to be true until man's nature has undergone a change and he accepts and practices the teaching of "doing unto others as he would be done by."

Many efforts have been put forth to prevent in one way or another by law the unjust practices in commerce and industry. At each stage of development through the genius of the human mind it has been found possible to evade the law, due in a large measure to the fact that the laws have been made in too definite or specific terms. It is well known that while certain individuals are endeavoring to construct burglar-proof safes, at the same time other individuals are planning to blow them, and usually succeed. So it is with a law applying to monopoly and unlawful combinations in restraint of trade. When an attempt is made to include in a law in definite terms what shall constitute an offense, all else is, under all rules of construction, excluded, and immediately the designing individual, together with his legal experts, begins to formulate plans to evade the specific provision of the law.

Any monopoly or unlawful combination which purposely restrains trade for gain at the expense of the masses is wrong, no matter under what guise or in what manner the result is attained. Therefore, I have always felt that the general terms of the Sherman antitrust law were wise, and I feel now that any attempt to specifically define illegal combinations would be a mistake. There are but two things to be considered, in my judgment, in the enactment of a law of this character to correct such abuses.

First. Outlaw all persons and corporations operating purposely in the undue restraint of trade to the detriment of the people, and having in mind the destruction of competition to the end that harvests may be reaped where not sown.

Second. Provide the machinery to obtain the facts, and then, with an honest administration, results will be achieved.

I stand ready now to support any proposition that will compel fair and honest competition between American business men, giving each in his sphere a fair opportunity to pit his genius and ability against that of every other man. I am not opposed nor ever have been to honest "big business," where the "big business" has been established by honest efforts and the efficiency of the men in control of the "big business," for I realize that in "big business" there is economy, and when honestly operated the masses of the people are benefited in the lower price of the product produced through the greater efficiency and economy of a large organization.

However, I am unalterably opposed to the forcing out of the man doing the smaller business by any other than the natural laws of trade and business efficiency. He should have his opportunity, and then it is up to him to make good. I wish to say, further, that while I am in favor of laws regulating the conduct of our American business men among themselves I am also in favor of giving them a square deal. It is not unjust to require honesty and fair dealing on the part of American business men, but it is absolutely unfair and unjust to hedge them about with laws and regulations for the protection of the masses of the American people, and at the same time enact a tariff law that will permit the unfair competition of the business man across the sea, over whom we have no jurisdiction and who, with his cheaply paid labor, including women and children, becomes at once an unfair competitor, and who sooner or later will destroy American business. I would regulate the conduct of our own business men and at the same time I would, by our revenue laws, say to the foreign business competitor, we have certain regulations in this country governing the conduct of business; we prevent the employment of children; we require proper sanitary regulations; we pay our workmen a living wage; our business men are taxed heavily to support our Government, and before you can come in and rob him of his market and the workman of his opportunity, you must lay down in form of a license a sufficient revenue to at least put you on an equality with him, before you are permitted to dump your cheap labor-made goods into our channels of trade.

To my mind, gentlemen of the committee, this is not only just but it is wise. I want to say also in relation to the amendments proposed to the section of this bill dealing with labor that I have never felt that the only way to benefit the workingman was to place him in a class by himself and exempt him from some of the laws of the land in which he lives, but I would protect him further, as I endeavored to do a short time ago by my vote on the immigration bill, by saying to him who would come from a foreign land, you shall not come into this country of ours and take from the American laboring man his place in the industrial world at a lower wage. In this way I would protect him against unjust and unfair competition, and this is the character of protection the American workingman desires and should have.

In connection with the proposed amendments relating to the farmer I have but a word. It was my good fortune to be born and reared on an Illinois farm. And I am sure if the law is made effective on those who would take undue advantage of the farmer no complaint would be heard from him. It is not the desire of farmers to establish monopolies or combinations for the purpose of extorting unreasonable prices for their products from the consumer, but all they ask is a fair opportunity and protection from illegal combinations with whom they may be compelled to deal, and the further privilege of enjoying the home market, which, I am sorry to say, is now thrown open to all the world, and sooner or later, unless the law is changed, the American farmer will suffer serious injury from the competition of foreign agricultural products in our market. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, touching the reference the gentleman made to partisanship, I wish to assure him that on our committee we treat Republicans just like they were as good as we are, and that or some other cause has made them powerful good men. If all Republicans were as good as they, they would not receive so much abuse from the third party and from the Democratic Party or from the people. [Laughter.]

But I tell you that if old man FRED. STEVENS and the other Republicans on our committee were fit types of the Republican Party it would stand much higher in the estimation of the people than it does. [Applause.] That is all I want to say in behalf of our committee.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I hope that will not be charged to the time controlled by the gentleman from Georgia. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. VOLLMER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. VOLLMER] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. VOLLMER. Mr. Chairman, the countless generations who have enjoyed the verse of the blind bard of ancient Greece have found therein no more delightful story than that of Ulysses and his wanderings after the fall of Troy and the many trials imposed upon him by the wrath of the Olympian gods. In that story there is no more thrilling chapter than the account of how he had to steer his little bark through a narrow strait between two terrible monsters, one called Scylla and the other Charybdis.

That exploit, however, was no more difficult to perform than is the task forced on the statesmen of this country to-day by the conditions produced by the stupendous and abnormal development—industrial, financial, and commercial—of recent years. For the question which is now propounded "by the Sphynx of fate to our advancing civilization and which not to answer means to be destroyed" is this: How can you guide our ship of state safely between plutocracy on the one hand and state socialism on the other? For the optimist who believes, or wishes to believe, that it can be done successfully, no more reassuring thought can come at the present moment than that there is now at the helm of that precious craft, freighted as she is with all the hopes of humanity, a man who more nearly than almost any Chief Executive this country has ever had, in subtle, profound, and all-encompassing intellectuality, resembles the mythological hero of ancient Ithaca as Homer paints him. [Applause.]

I know that in some quarters latterly it has become the fashion to sneer at Woodrow Wilson. His great heart has been sorely wounded by it, though in the nature of the case he has not been as directly and personally and continuously exposed to it as we on this floor who believe in him and who almost every day for months of the session have had to take the gaff of carping and unjust criticism, of malevolent innuendo, and of vitriolic vituperation directed at him, his administration, and our party. And when you consider it rightly and think of the source of these vicious and unceasing attacks and see them poured out on that devoted head in increasing volume in connection with the very subject now under discussion, one hardly knows whether to weep or to laugh, or to be consumed in sheer amazement at the unblushing audacity, the marvelous nerve, the sheer effrontery, the triple-plated, brazen cheek frequently displayed in the proceeding. For who are they that are making these assaults? Are they not the sole surviving representatives of the party whose policies have produced the exceedingly grave condition in which the country now finds itself? Are they not the people who for many years entered into unholy compact with the great special interests and in return for campaign contributions and political support conveyed special privileges to the favored classes at the expense of the toiling masses of the land? Are they not the ones who converted the home market into the closed preserves of domestic monopoly, and by a false economic system, a sophistical hothouse-forcing process, a tariff of abominations, developed these industrial Frankensteins, the trusts of to-day, in whose gigantic shadow the tender plant of individual enterprise, unable to find the life-giving light of the sun of opportunity, must inevitably sicken and die? We now see certain old political owls come flapping out of the ruins and sit blinking in the bright light of the morning of a progressive era, and think that with their discordant hoots and screechings they can bring back the reactionary night which has gone forever. [Applause.]

It seems to me that it ill becomes gentlemen representing that party on this floor to stand here and sneer, in season and out of season, at honest and sincere efforts at reform of bad conditions on our part, no matter how much they may differ from us as to the wisdom of the policies involved.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLLMER. I do.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wanted to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that it would be a good time now to count the heads on the other side of the House. I see two over there, and as he has held up his fingers he has evidently recorded them. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not neglect to notice the fact that the Progressives are represented here.

Mr. ADAMSON. One more. That is one of our particular friends, the Bull Moosers. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. We are as punctual in our attendance as anybody else in the House. [Applause.]

A MEMBER. Order!

Mr. VOLLMER. My Republican friends, for 24 years it has been attempted to correct abuses patent to all by means of a law for which you claim the credit, though it is not solely yours, and during all this time the trusts have multiplied and grown more powerful day by day. The country has looked on hopelessly at your unavailing efforts, and when the Government's sporadic and well-advertised successes in the courts in such notable cases as the Northern Securities, the Standard Oil, and the American Tobacco Co. cases were followed by a practical continuance of the same old monopolistic system and an actual increase in prices and in stock values, as shown by listings on change, of the concerns involved, then it was that the country rose up against you and howled you from long-held power, and you were able to retain in the Electoral College only ossified old Vermont in the East and the Mormon State in the far West and the impotent Lilliputian minority on this floor.

Your hopes are reviving now, because you think that the old dodge is going to work again this fall; that the people have not sufficient intelligence and capacity for self-government to insist on a fair test for the reforms which we have inaugurated and are about to inaugurate, but will allow themselves again to be misled by those who have the power to produce depression in trade and industry in order to discredit the party which dares to honestly attempt genuine reform in the people's interests.

If the voters are always going to fall for that old bunco game, we might as well give up the Republic and frankly adopt in its stead the benevolent (or otherwise) feudalism of trust domination, which means collosal fortunes in the hands of the few, wrung from the producing millions, and an economic absolutism, tempered perhaps with occasional gifts of libraries and universities, even as the old Cæsars were accustomed to placate the mob of Rome with gifts of corn and circus. Yours is the old Hamiltonian doctrine that the Government should take care of the rich and let the rich take care of the poor.

Your proposition now is to do nothing, but continue blindly and vacuously with your old Sherman law, whose inutility to produce substantial change for the better in business conditions ought to be visible to a blind man to-day.

If the people should demonstrate their political incompetency by depriving of power the party which, under the guidance and leadership of Woodrow Wilson, is attempting to do something substantial for them before the attempt is fairly tested as to its efficacy, the day is not far distant when a few colossi of modern finance will absolutely dominate this fair land of ours and the rest of us expropriated and disinherited Americans, robbed of our God-given and inherent right to equal opportunity, "can peep about under their huge legs to find ourselves dishonorable graves." And this will, indeed, be a fine finish for the dream of Washington, the ideal of Jefferson, and the experiment of Abraham Lincoln. Steer the ship of state in that direction and perhaps it will seem to drift more easily for a while, but not far away I can see the yawning whirlpool of popular revolution and anarchy, and as history, with sublime irony, has so often recorded the same old story, out of the night of chaos will come riding the man on horseback, bringing with him law and order, but as its price military despotism.

On the other hand and at the other extreme, we have with us again the pied piper, whose strenuous fluting possesses such hypnotic power over mice and men in the Hamelin of American politics. Fresh from the jungles of South America, he wants to lead the American people into the jungles of Bull Moose philosophy on this question.

Let us keep clearly before us that their policies of recognition, legalization, and attempted regulation of the trusts can have but one finish, and that is State socialism, which Herbert Spencer calls "the coming slavery."

If the country is to escape both of these actually imminent dangers—plutocracy, the most sordid and degraded form of government, with its denial of all our Democratic and Republican ideals, on the one hand, and socialism, with its chimerical program unsquared to human nature as it is, doomed to failure and certain to eventuate only in a policy of confiscation and plunder, which will mean destruction to civilization, on the other hand; if our Government is to be preserved on the basis of economic individualism, under the forms of constitutional representative government, the people must now rally to the support of the great, quiet, gentle, self-contained man who stands at the helm of our ship of state. They should strengthen the spirit and hold up the arm of this modern Ulysses, so that he may take the vessel safely through, according to the time-tried chart of Jeffersonian Democracy, into the haven of the new freedom, where there shall be some liberty, some equality, and some fraternity for all of us.

Leaving the domain of generalities, what in sober detail do we now propose? A trade commission, which will supplement the juristic work of the courts with the expert, administrative aid of business experts, both in the discovery of wrongs done, the prevention of others, and the effective rectification and restoration of business conditions.

Then in terms of express and exact statute law, definitions which can not be misunderstood, which he who runs can read, and which shall illumine with the light of day the celebrated twilight zone of the Sherman law. Then some plain provisions, calculated to prevent or adequately punish certain favorite methods by which monopoly has been built up in this country, such as unfair competition, arbitrary price discrimination, tying contracts, interlocking directorates, monopolistic exploitation, and denial of access to those things that are the gifts of nature, its forces and its products, which no man has created and without which men can not live, and which constitute the basic essentials of effective and complete monopoly. Also, what all political parties have promised, but up to date none has performed—a bill of rights for labor against government by injunction with all its evil implications; against prosecution of labor in its union and of the tiller of the soil in his grange under the rigidly construed letter of the Sherman law; and then arresting the statutes of limitations and by the estoppal provision giving to private litigants the benefit of years of effort in their behalf by officers of the Government in successful trust prosecutions.

And finally now we have before us the last of the three legislative brothers, a bill which shall prevent the extension of the blanket mortgage of stocks and bonds put on the country by the financial manipulation of the railroads in the wholesale issue of securities on which they claim the right to earn dividends and interest, a measure designed to insure a dollar of real value behind every dollar of such paper floated on the markets for the protection of the investing as well as the shipping and consuming public of the United States.

Gentlemen, we have people who can not see the woods on account of the trees, as the old German proverb says. We have had much analytical discussion of the various clauses of these bills. I thought it was time that somebody made a little synthesis of the essential natures of these three bills, since they constitute another and an important chapter of the program of constructive and progressive legislation that will go down in history linked with the name of Woodrow Wilson.

I have attempted to do this hastily in this cursory résumé. I am glad to have had some part, even though a very inconspicuous and humble one, in this great work. On behalf of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, I believe I can say that we can confidently appeal to an intelligent and unbiased posterity, as to the rectitude of our intentions and the essential wisdom of our policies. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thee, we trust, with true hearts, that our inward life may be brought into conformity with Thy will. By Thy grace may we be enabled to understand the things that we see. By Thy guidance may our wills be brought into harmony with Thy will, our consciences with Thy law, and our hearts with Thy love, so that our lives may be God-centered and may be expressive of God's will in the world. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. BRANDEGEE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 384, by Mr. CUMMINS——

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent that we take up Senate bill 4522, it being the bill which was under consideration for a short while yesterday.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4522) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Perkins	Stephenson
Brady	Jones	Pittman	Sterling
Brandegee	Kenyon	Pomerene	Thomas
Bristow	Kern	Ransdell	Thompson
Bryan	La Follette	Reed	Thornton
Burton	Lane	Saulsbury	Tillman
Catron	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Walsh
Chamberlain	McCumber	Sheppard	West
Clark, Wyo.	Martine, N. J.	Sherman	White
Crawford	Myers	Simmons	Williams
Cummins	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Gallinger	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Goff	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is unavoidably absent, and that he is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CUMMINS. I am informed that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has an amendment which he desires to present and he wishes a little further time to prepare it. Therefore I am willing that the bill shall be laid aside, and I give notice that to-morrow morning at the close of the routine business I shall again ask for unanimous consent to consider it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and I can agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] as to whether certain amendments which each of us has suggested are necessary. I am disposed now to believe that the one I suggested is not necessary. I should like to look at the authorities called to my attention by the Senator from Iowa, and I believe we can speed the measure. I think that my amendment will probably be out of the way to-morrow. I will confer with the Senator from Missouri and I hope he will confer with the Senator from Iowa, and possibly we may eliminate any further discussion and be able to take up the bill to-morrow and vote upon it to-morrow——

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Because we are both just as warmly in favor of the measure as is the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no other desire save to secure speedy action on the bill, and I suggest that course. I do not know just what motion I ought to make or what consent I ought to ask in order to accomplish it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have a few amendments which I desire to offer to this bill, but I can offer them to-morrow as well as to-day.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in order to get what I want before the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow morning immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business the bill be taken up for consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would require a roll call under the rules before we could vote on it. I do not believe the unanimous consent would be now given, but I believe it will be given to-morrow morning. If we can work it out so that the bill can be disposed of in an hour, I am sure that there will be no one on this side who will not join with the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia; and, with that understanding, the unanimous consent I asked for a moment ago may be vacated, if that can be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent the bill will go back to the calendar.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to give notice of an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (S. 4522) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On line 12, page 3, strike out the words "to such property caused by it or by" and insert in lieu thereof the words "occurring to such property while in its possession, or under its care, or while in the possession or under the care of."

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Panama Canal tolls bill be laid before the Senate, so that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] may address himself to it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hughes	Oliver	Stephenson
Borah	James	Page	Sutherland
Brady	Kern	Perkins	Swanson
Brandegee	La Follette	Ransdell	Thomas
Bristow	Lane	Reed	Thompson
Catron	Lea, Tenn.	Root	Thornton
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Vardaman
Chilton	Lippitt	Sheppard	Walsh

Goff	Nelson	Smith, Md.	Works
Gore	Newlands	Smith, Mich.
Gronna	Norris	Smith, S. C.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence, on official business, of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], all of whom are paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. He is paired with me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. I understand that he is paired to-day with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. I make this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I dislike very much to interfere with the notice given by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. That Senator, however, is not here, and we have given notice that we would desire, beginning with to-day, that the bill be constantly kept before the Senate. Inasmuch as no other Senator is ready to proceed, I shall do so myself.

Mr. President, following the example set by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who opened this debate against repeal, and of other Senators who have reduced their remarks to writing and read them to the Senate, I ask my colleagues to refrain from interruption while I am proceeding with my statement.

Mr. President, the opponents of repeal rely upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen against Smith as an authority for their contention that the exemption of our coastwise trade through the canal from tolls does not entitle other nations to claim like exemption for their vessels. I deny that there is any analogy between that case and the one now under discussion.

If the question presented in the Olsen case had been the question here presented, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court would have been, to say the least, questionable; and a decision without jurisdiction is mere dictum. If a case of this sort was justiciable by the Supreme Court, we would not have the proposal of both ex-President Taft and the learned Senator from Montana—himself a great lawyer—to confer by congressional action jurisdiction upon that court to hear and decide the controversy here involved. But if the question here involved were justiciable by that court, and if that court had decided it in an analogous case in favor of the contention now made, Great Britain would not be any more bound by that decision than we would be bound by a decision to the contrary by the court of last resort of Great Britain.

But, putting aside this technical objection, the two cases upon their merits are in no important particular alike. The clause of the treaty referred to in the Olsen case, and so often quoted in this discussion, applies to ships and not to traffic, as does the provision in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty now under discussion. That this clause in the treaty of 1815 applies only to vessels and not to traffic, appears not only from the language of the clause itself, but from the circumstance that the terms and condition of traffic between the two countries are prescribed in an altogether different clause from the one relating to vessels.

But, independently of these facts, it is obvious that only oversea vessels were intended to be embraced, or could, in the nature of things, be embraced, in the clause quoted in the Olsen case, because, by the plain language of that treaty, the reciprocal commerce in which these vessels were to be engaged is confined to "commerce between the territories of the United States of America and all the territories of Great Britain in Europe." As trade between territories separated by an ocean must of necessity be carried in over-sea vessels, it is clear that only oversea traffic was contemplated.

That coastwise vessels were not included in that clause is further evidenced by the fact that at the close of the article containing the clause with respect to vessels there is a separate clause which deals with commerce between the United States and the West Indies and Canada—dependencies of Great Britain—which expressly provides that with respect to such intercourse "each party to the contract should remain in the complete possession of its rights."

In further corroboration of this construction, there is also a provision in a subsequent article of that treaty with respect to commercial intercourse between the United States and the territories of Great Britain in the East Indies which expressly excludes the vessels of the one country from engaging in the coastwise traffic of the territories and possessions of the other.

Comparing the provisions of the treaty of 1815, upon which the Olsen case was decided, with the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, involved in this controversy, it is impossible to escape the conclusion reached with respect to this matter by ex-Secretary of State Richard Olney, one of America's greatest lawyers, when he expressed the positive opinion that "there was no analogy or resemblance between the two cases."

"VESSELS OF COMMERCE."

It has been contended by some Senators that the phrase "vessels of commerce," used in this treaty, is a purely technical phrase, and in legal intendment means not vessels engaged in general commerce, but only vessels engaged in foreign trade. The junior Senator from New York, who raised this contention, based it upon the authority of a few lines from an English law dictionary and a clipping from an English newspaper.

Mr. President, the phrase "vessels of commerce" was incorporated in our statutory law over 60 years ago and has been given judicial construction which has never to this day been questioned.

The Circuit Court of the United States in the case of the United States v. Cutler (1 Curtis, U. S. Circuit Rept., at pp. 503 to 515) decided this very question in 1853 and decided it directly contrary to the interpretation now sought to be given it by the Senator from New York and other Senators who have followed his lead. The decision in that case turned upon the meaning of the term "vessels of commerce" in the act of 1850. The act referred to will be found in the Ninth Statute at Large, page 515, and contains the following proviso:

Provided, That flogging in the Navy and on board of vessels of commerce be, and the same hereby is, abolished from and after the passage of this act.

The question involved in that case was whether a whaling vessel was included in the meaning of the words "vessels of commerce" as used in this act, and it was held—that distinguished jurist, Judge Curtis, then a justice of the United States Supreme Court, delivering the opinion—that the term "vessels of commerce" used in that act meant all vessels which are a subject of jurisdiction within the constitutional power of Congress, within its power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. "In the strictest sense, therefore," says the court, "such vessels (meaning whaling vessels) are engaged in commerce, and may be called, though it is in legislation a new phrase, 'vessels of commerce.' In this sense," says the judge delivering the opinion, "I shall construe that Congress used the words, intending to embrace all vessels within the commercial power of Congress."

It will be seen that by this decision the court held that the term "vessels of commerce" includes all vessels over which Congress has jurisdiction, both vessels engaged in foreign commerce and vessels engaged in commerce between the States.

THE JURISDICTION OF THE TREATY-MAKING POWER.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], in an elaborate argument, contends that while the Constitution confers upon the treaty-making power certain jurisdiction in the matter of regulating foreign commerce, under the Constitution Congress alone can regulate commerce between the States, and he strenuously contended that the controverted provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is null and void because, he argued, it attempts to regulate interstate commerce, over which Congress, by the Constitution, is given exclusive jurisdiction. If the soundness of the argument of the Senator, with respect to the treaty provisions or stipulations which are alleged to affect interstate commerce, was admitted—and it is not admitted—his argument in this behalf is completely answered by the fact that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not in any way attempt to regulate domestic commerce. It does not attempt to fix the rates of tolls charged against vessels of the United States, but it leaves the settlement of that question entirely to the United States. Congress can impose such tolls as it sees fit upon our domestic or over-sea vessels, or it can exempt them altogether if it sees proper. The treaty in no way attempts to interfere with the right of Congress to do as it pleases in this matter. It merely provides that if Congress, in the exercise of its right to regulate these charges, shall decide to impose tolls upon our vessels, it shall impose no greater rate of tolls upon foreign vessels, and if it shall decide to exempt our vessels it shall also exempt foreign vessels from such payment.

The provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are in this respect the same as those contained in practically all of our treaties of commerce and navigation with respect to the duties and charges of vessels embraced in the terms of those treaties.

Clearly, I submit, the argument of the Senator from Louisiana is without force in its application to the facts in the case under discussion.

OUR COASTWISE TRADE AND NAVIGATION LAWS.

Mr. President, the argument most relied upon by the opponents of repeal is their contention that our coastwise trade is not included in the terms and stipulations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, not because it is expressly or impliedly excluded, but because under our navigation laws only domestic vessels are permitted to engage in this trade.

In the consideration of this argument it is important that there should be a clear understanding of the function of the canal in connection with general commerce and of the conditions against which it was sought by that treaty to safeguard such commerce as might seek passage through it.

In the interest of clarity in the presentation I shall make, let me state my understanding of that situation.

The United States was getting ready to undertake the construction of a canal at some point across the Isthmus connecting the two oceans. It was to become a great international interoceanic highway for commerce of all kinds and of all nations. It was, of course, foreseen by all that the United States would impose a charge for the use of the canal which would in the course of time pay the cost of its operation and amortize the capital expended in its construction.

In these conditions two things became of paramount importance to the prospective customers of this waterway represented in this treaty by Great Britain:

First, it was of the utmost importance that all commerce through the canal, without regard to the kind or the character of vessels in which it was carried, or from whence it came or where it was going, should contribute its equitable and pro rata part to this general fund.

Second, it was of still greater importance that there should be no discrimination against citizens of different countries in the conditions and charges imposed for the use of the canal which would abridge or disturb the equal opportunity of competition and intercourse in the markets of the world to which, of right, they were equally entitled; in other words, that the canal should not be made the instrument of revolutionizing and upsetting the established equilibrium of world commerce.

The provisions of the treaty for equality of treatment of vessels and against traffic discrimination must be interpreted in the light of the purposes embraced in these two general propositions—propositions in which the United States as builder, as well as the other nations as customers, were interested.

From this standpoint I propose to consider the argument that the exemption in the act of 1912 of our coastwise trade does not contravene the treaty, because only domestic vessels can engage in that trade under our navigation laws.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not, as does the treaty of 1815—referred to in the Olsen case—differentiate between vessels engaged in different kinds of trade. It refers to vessels only as vehicles of trade. It is directed mainly to traffic. It seeks to put traffic—the commerce—of all countries upon an equal footing with respect to canal charges, and to this end it stipulates that the canal shall be open to vessels of all nations upon terms of entire equality, so that there may be no discrimination in the use of the canal between the citizens of one nation in favor of those of another nation in the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

Therefore the paramount object sought is the protection of those interested in this merchandise, whether as seller or buyer, against discrimination, and any regulation with reference to the vehicles in which this merchandise is conveyed which has the effect of placing a burden upon the merchandise of the citizens of one country from which the citizens of another country are exempt necessarily violates the treaty guaranty of equal treatment.

It is true that no foreign vessel can engage in our coastwise trade. But it is equally true that vessels of practically all countries enjoy unrestricted freedom of trade in any and all ports upon our two coasts. Foreign vessels are just as free to sell their incoming cargoes and to buy their return cargoes of merchandise in the cities of New York or San Francisco as an American coasting vessel. They can not engage in coastal or intercoastal trade, but at every port in the United States the trade in which they are permitted to engage comes in direct competition with the trade in which the American coastwise vessels engage.

Is it not clear under these circumstances, when they both use the canal in reaching their destination, the law which this bill repeals will inevitably work a discrimination against the merchandise in the foreign vessel and in favor of the merchandise in the domestic vessel?

CONCRETE ILLUSTRATION OF DISCRIMINATORY EFFECT OF EXEMPTION.

Let me illustrate with a concrete example which will be of everyday occurrence and which will show the result I have indicated:

When the canal is opened the Pacific coast will buy its coal, let us say, either from Wales or from some Atlantic coast port of the United States. If from Wales, it will have to be transported in a foreign vessel or in an American over-sea vessel which, like a foreign vessel, will be required to pay tolls. If shipped from our Atlantic coast, say Baltimore or Norfolk, it will have to be transported in an American coastwise vessel. Both of these vessels will have to pass through the canal—the one from Wales will pay tolls and the one from Baltimore or Norfolk will pay no tolls. Their cargoes of coal will be sold in San Francisco or some other Pacific port of the United States—the one burdened and the other not burdened with a charge for passing through the canal, at the rate of $1.20 per net registered ton.

This illustration makes it clear that the fact that foreign vessels can not engage in our coastwise trade is immaterial in so far as competition at the place of sale upon the other coast of this country is concerned, and therefore that exemption of our coastwise vessels from tolls will be just as much a discrimination against foreign vessels trading in these ports in coal as would be a similar exemption of our over-sea vessels trading in coal at the same ports.

This is exactly what the statement of the British chargé d'affaires, Mr. A. Mitchell Innes, meant in his letter of July 18, 1912—a detached excerpt of which has been quoted by Senators so as to give it a meaning the very reverse of which the full text imports—when he said: "It appears to my Government that it would be impossible to frame," that is, for the Government of the United States to frame, "regulations which would prevent the exemption" of United States coastwise vessels "from resulting, in fact, in preference to United States shipping and consequently in an infraction of the treaty."

It is exactly what Sir Edward Grey, of the British foreign office, meant in his letter to Mr. Knox, our former Secretary of State, when he said that "coastwise," meaning American coastwise, "trade can not be circumscribed so completely that the benefits conferred upon it will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade, and thereby constitute a discrimination in plain contravention of the provisions of the treaty."

But let me give another illustration of the practical workings of this exemption of our coastwise vessels in its discriminatory effect upon vessels in the over-sea trade which not only establishes the point I am now making, but which will at the same time establish one or more other controverted propositions which have been asserted in this discussion.

STATEMENTS OF FACTS WHICH SUPPORT SEVERAL CONTROVERTED CONTENTIONS.

In the hearings before the Interoceanic Canal Committee there appeared some gentlemen from the Pacific coast—from the Oregon and Washington country—who developed strong opposition to the pending bill. They said, among other things, that lumber was a great industry of the section from which they came. This section, they declared, manufactured large quantities of fir pine, much of which was of a low grade, and for which there was no adequate market on the Pacific coast. They wanted to ship this low-grade lumber to the Atlantic coast of the United States, to be sold in competition with like lumber, the product of the Atlantic Coast States, and wished exemption from tolls in part to better enable them to meet this competition. But they said that the manufacture of the same kind and grade of lumber was also one of the chief industries of British Columbia—located just across the border from the State of Washington—with which lumber they would also have to compete in their prospective trade with our Atlantic coast. This Oregon and Washington lumber, they said, would have to be shipped in American coastwise vessels, while the lumber of British Columbia would be shipped in foreign vessels, and they contended that by reason of the lesser cost of construction and operation of these foreign vessels they would be put at a disadvantage in this competition, and they therefore argued if our coastwise vessels were exempt from tolls, while foreign vessels were required to pay tolls, it would tend to equalize this difference in the cost of transportation and, to that extent, the conditions of competition between their lumber and that of British Columbia at our Atlantic ports would be measurably equalized. This character of argument ran through much of the testimony that was presented to the committee.

Is it not apparent that this argument admits several things?

First, it admits that the benefit of the remission of tolls to our coastwise vessels would be appropriated by the owners of these vessels to overcome the lesser operating expenses of their foreign competitors.

Second, it admits that the exemption would be a discrimination against the citizens of British Columbia competing with citizens of our Pacific coast for the lumber trade of the Atlantic ports of the United States.

Third, it admits that a cargo of British Columbia lumber passing through the canal in a foreign vessel and a cargo of Oregon and Washington State lumber passing through the canal in a coastwise vessel would eventually meet upon common ground and be sold in competition, the one with the other, say, in Baltimore, Philadelphia, or New York, to the identical extent that the respective cargoes of two coastwise vessels loaded with lumber, the product of the State of Washington or Oregon, would eventually meet upon common ground and be sold in competition, the one with the other, at these ports of our Atlantic coast.

Could the case of discrimination of the very kind denounced in the treaty be more conclusively established than by the grounds upon which exemption from tolls in this case was advocated and demanded?

SERIOUS SITUATION WITH REFERENCE TO OUR CONTINENTAL NEIGHBORS.

In order to press home the seriousness of the situation with respect to our trade relations, especially with our continental neighbors to the north and to the south, which will inevitably result from the proposed discriminatory canal rates, it is only necessary to contrast the present conditions of transit from coast to coast of this continent with the conditions which will exist when the canal is opened, unless the bill under consideration is passed. Under present conditions the Pacific coast trade of the United States, of Canada, and of South and Central America is upon a basis of absolute equality so far as transit across the continent is concerned, whether that transit be by the Tehuantepec route or by the Panama Railroad or around the Horn. This is true not only with respect to European traffic but it is equally true with respect to the traffic of these Pacific coast countries with the Atlantic ports of the United States.

Under present conditions the Atlantic coast traffic of the United States, of Canada, and of South and Central America with the Orient and the Pacific ports of the United States is likewise upon terms of absolute equality so far as transit across the continent is concerned by either of the three presently available routes.

When the canal is opened, whether that event occurs this year, next year, or later, this situation would be changed and the present conditions of equality will cease.

Does anyone believe that our neighbors to the north and to the south will view with complacency the discriminatory conditions following the opening of the canal which I have described? Does anyone doubt that this discrimination, not only against their commerce but against their vessels, will arouse antagonism? Does anyone doubt it will not only prejudicially affect our present friendly relations with them but will tend to defeat one of the main objects we had in view in the construction of this canal, namely, to further cement our political relations and to extend our trade and commerce with the countries of this hemisphere?

In view of the consequences certain to result from these discriminatory rates, is it not apparent, even if we were under no treaty guaranty of equality, if we were absolutely free and untrammeled to do what we pleased with respect to charges and conditions of traffic through the canal, that a sound and wise public policy, in the interest of peace and amity and of commerce, would dictate that we should not for a small and, to say the least, doubtful, advantage deliberately pursue a course which will inevitably lead to such disastrous consequences to our political and trade relations with our neighbors and friends upon this continent, to say nothing about similar though less acute complications in our commercial and political relations with the other nations of the world?

TAFT'S CONTEMPORANEOUS ACTS AND SUBSEQUENT DECLARATIONS ANALYZED.

Ex-President Taft is cited as a great lawyer who believes we have the right under the treaty to discriminate in favor of our coastwise trade, and his declaration to that effect when he signed the act which it is sought to repeal is referred to as the statement of a great lawyer acting under the heavy responsibility of public duty. Mr. President, I submit that the grounds upon which ex-President Taft based that opinion, as shown both in his contemporaneous act and in his subsequent declarations upon the subject, disclose the fact that he entertained grave doubts as to the soundness of the views he expressed then and is tantamount to an admission of the principle for which those who advocate repeal of that act now contend. If the ex-President had no misgivings as to the correctness of the opinion then expressed, why, then, did he supplement his approval of the canal act of 1912 with a memorandum suggesting the passage of an act by Congress submitting the question of our right to make this discrimination to the Supreme Court of the United States for its advice and decision?

If ex-President Taft had no misgivings as to our rights in the premises, why his emphatic declaration made in his speech at the International Peace Forum in New York January 18, 1913, of his willingness—yes, even his eagerness—to submit this question to the arbitration and settlement of an impartial tribunal?

But infinitely stronger than this recommendation and this speech of the ex-President as showing not only his misgivings but the state of his mind with reference to this question is the basis upon which he fixed the rate of tolls for passage through the canal, namely, assuming the payment of tolls by our coastwise vessels, and the statement made in his Ottawa speech, delivered in January of this year, in support of his contention that with the adjustment of the tolls as fixed in his proclamation the exemption did not contravene the treaty.

In that speech Mr. Taft, speaking to a Canadian audience, said:

> Tolls have been fixed on the canal for all the world on the assumption that coastwise traffic is to pay tolls. Our giving it immunity from tolls does not, in our judgment, affect the traffic of other countries in any other way than it would affect it if we voted a subsidy equal to the tolls remitted to our ships.

That is to say, paid the tolls for them. And then he adds:

If Canada is affected that way, she, too, can subsidize her trade from Quebec to Vancouver.

In other words, according to the views expressed in this speech, the ex-President based the validity of the act of 1912 upon a subsequent act of the Executive and his assumption that the remission of tolls was equivalent to their payment by the Government of the United States.

Verily, the ex-President in this exposition comes dangerously near admitting, if indeed he does not in fact admit, the principle contended for by those who favor repeal.

NEGOTIATORS ACT UPON SENATE RECORD AND NOT UNDISCLOSED MOTIVES OF SENATORS.

Again, Mr. President, those who contend that our coastwise vessels and trade are not included in the terms of the treaty find themselves upon the very threshold of this controversy confronted by the adverse vote upon the amendment offered in the Senate to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty by ex-Senator Bard, of California, expressly exempting our coastwise trade from the operation of the treaty. To avoid the effect of this adverse vote, which would otherwise have to be admitted as a controlling fact in this controversy, it is suggested that some Senators voted against the amendment not on its merits but because they thought it unnecessary. That is a way of disposing of a deliberate act of a legislative body which, I take it, will not appeal very strongly to the public. However that may be, after everything by way of explaining away this vote is said that can be said, the fact remains that the motives which actuate Senators in casting their votes, even when the debates upon questions are taken down and preserved, very frequently remain locked in their breasts; but where the vote is in executive session, where the discussions are not taken down and preserved, as in this case, the outside public, at least, has nothing but the concrete action of that body to guide it in reaching a conclusion as to the basis of its action. Looking to the record, which is supposed to import verity as the certain expression of the thought and purpose of the Senate with respect to this amendment and upon which the public, especially foreign Governments, had the right to rely, what is disclosed?

It discloses two concrete record facts, each of tremendous import in this controversy, namely, the report to the Senate of the majority members of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the vote of the Senate on the Bard amendment.

The Committee on Foreign Relations had maturely considered the treaty; it had reached a conclusion. The treaty was favorably reported, and accompanying it was a majority report, drawn by the chairman, ex-Senator Cushman Davis, admittedly a great lawyer and as profoundly familiar with the subject and its history as any public man of that day. This report declared in terms it was impossible to misunderstand that in entering into this treaty the United States had no purpose of reserving to itself any exclusive benefit in the use of the canal; that it was to be constructed for the equal use of mankind; that it would be unworthy of the United States, in view of its professions with respect to this project, stretching over a half century, to seek any selfish advantage or preferential rights over other nations in the use of this waterway.

The action of the Senate upon the Bard amendment, taken by itself and speaking for itself, was a clear, emphatic declaration that the Senate disapproved of so amending the treaty as to reserve to the United States the right to exempt from tolls its coastwise vessels through the canal without exempting those of other nations.

NO EVIDENCE OF MOTIVES OF SENATORS DISCLOSED TO NEGOTIATORS.

While the motives of Senators with respect to their votes upon this amendment were of course known to themselves, they were not known to the public; there is no evidence that they were made known to Mr. Hay or to our Secretary of State; there is no evidence that they were made known to our ambassador to Great Britain, Mr. Choate, or to Mr. White, our chargé d'affaires. There is no evidence that they were made known to Lord Pauncefote or Lord Lansdowne, the British negotiators; or that they were made known to the members of the British cabinet, which approved the second treaty, or to the members of the British Parliament. But while these men, representing the high contracting parties in negotiating and making the second treaty, had no knowledge of the motives of Senators in the votes cast by them in secret executive session in the consideration of the first treaty, they did have knowledge, Mr. President—because it was a matter of public record—of the report of the majority members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, prepared by its chairman, Senator Davis; and they did have knowledge of the adverse vote of the Senate on the Bard amendment, and they had the right to consider these record facts as correctly reflecting the sentiments of the Senate, and there is no reason to suppose they did not so consider them.

I submit it would be unreasonable to suppose, so far as these negotiators were concerned, especially the British negotiators—and so far as the British cabinet, which approved the treaty, and the Parliament of Great Britain, which adopted it, are concerned—that in making the second treaty they acted without a thorough knowledge of these solemn, official declarations and acts as expressing the thought and purpose of this Government in regard to the rule of equality "in conditions or charges or otherwise" which was to obtain with respect to the use of the canal by the nations of the world, including Great Britain and the United States.

IS "ALL NATIONS" INCLUSIVE OR EXCLUSIVE OF THE UNITED STATES?

The other contention upon which the opponents of repeal most rely is that the phrase "all nations," as used in the guaranty of equality, means all "other" nations and does not include the United States.

It has been intimated that ex-Secretary of State Hay, who negotiated the treaty, and in whose knowledge, sincerity, and patriotism all repose implicit confidence, did not think the United States were included in the term "all nations," and his great name has been invoked in support of that contention.

I have read the correspondence between Mr. Hay and our ambassador, Mr. Choate, and Lord Pauncefote and Lord Lansdowne. There is not a line in this correspondence to sustain this contention. On the contrary, it is incredible to me that anyone who has carefully read that correspondence can doubt what Mr. Hay's intentions were—can conclude that he intended that the treaty as agreed to should reserve to the United States any preferential right or exclusive benefit in the use of the canal. Mr. Choate's letters since Mr. Hay's death, as well as their correspondence when the treaty was under negotiation, would seem to make this clear.

"ALL MEANS ALL"—MR. HAY'S VIEWS AND STATEMENT TO MR. W. FLETCHER JOHNSON.

In the Clayton-Bulwer treaty equality between the United States and Great Britain was in express terms provided for, and all other nations were to come in on like terms. Those provisions seem to have been always present in the minds of Mr. Hay, Mr. Choate, and Mr. White, and there was never any expression used by either of them in this correspondence of a different import.

That was the basic idea pervading the entire negotiations, and, although it at times found expression in the general term of "all nations," yet on several occasions there was particular mention made of equality as between the United States and Great Britain, and as between the United States and all other nations.

In his letter to Secretary of State Hay, dated August 20, 1901, Mr. Choate, in suggesting a modification of the proposed article 4, which was intended to extend the general principle of this treaty to future canals, asked the question, "Assuming that some such article must be retained, how would this do?" And then he outlined in the following terms his opinion of what the proposition should be, namely:

In view of the permanent character of this treaty whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is reaffirmed, the United States hereby declares (and agrees) that it will impose no other charges or conditions of traffic upon any other canal that may be built across the Isthmus (or between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans) than such as are just and equitable, and that such canals shall be open to the subjects and citizens of the United States and of all other nations on equal terms.

This question shows beyond peradventure Mr. Choate's idea as to what it was intended the treaty should provide with respect to equality of terms of treatment of commerce through the canal.

Well knowing Mr. Choate's mind, Col. Hay, on September 2, 1901, replying to Mr. Choate's letter of the 20th of August, and referring to the views expressed by him in that letter, used this language:

Your views are so clear and definite and so entirely in accord with my own that I find it unnecessary to give you any extended instructions as to this very important matter.

These two letters not only show that Mr. Hay and Mr. Choate were in entire accord, but it discloses what, in their opinion, should be the scope and purport of the agreement between the two countries with respect to equality of treatment.

But if the record we have of Mr. Hay's connection with this transaction does not make his attitude clear beyond peradventure, we have the positive testimony of a reputable and distinguished journalist of a conversation with Mr. Hay upon this identical subject and point which leaves no room for doubt as to what Mr. Hay understood and intended and as to what he thought the treaty as drawn accomplished in this regard. I refer to the statement of Mr. William Fletcher Johnson, published in the May, 1914, issue of the North American Review, who claims to recall distinctly a conversation he had with Mr. Hay upon this subject in 1904. I quote Mr. Johnson's words. He says:

I asked Col. Hay plumply if the treaty meant what it appeared to mean on its face, and whether the phrase "vessels of all nations" was intended to include our own shipping or was it to be interpreted as meaning "all other nations." The Secretary smiled, half indulgently, half quizzically, as he replied:

"'All' means all. The treaty was not so long that we could not have made room for the word 'other' if we had understood that it belonged there. 'All nations' means all nations, and the United States certainly is a nation."

"That was the understanding between yourself and Lord Pauncefote when you and he made the treaty?" I pursued.

"It certainly was," he replied. "It was the understanding of both Governments, and I have no doubt that the Senate realized that in ratifying the second treaty without such an amendment it was committing us to the principle of giving all friendly nations equal privileges in the canal with ourselves. This is our golden rule."

WHY ANTI-REPEALERS WOULD ELIMINATE OUR TRADITIONAL POLICY.

Mr. President, I do not wonder at the eagerness of the opponents of repeal to have us leave the history of these canal treaties and our traditional policy of equality of treatment of all vessels of all nations out of this discussion and have us decide the debated questions with regard to the correct interpretation on the cold reading of the treaty, because, as I see and understand it, every line of that policy and of that history condemns their contention.

The United States to-day has treaties of commerce and navigation with nearly every nation of importance in the world. These treaties provide for the reciprocal and equal treatment of the vessels of the contracting parties in the matter of duties and charges. By similar arrangement nearly all the leading nations of the world to-day are under contract to grant to foreign vessels equal treatment with the vessels of their own country. This equality of treatment has become a fixed and settled principle of international maritime intercourse. The benefits that have accrued from it have been mutual and incalculable alike in the promotion of amity, peace, civilization, and commerce. What nation, I ask, Mr. President, was the pioneer in the inauguration and bringing about these happy international relations? I answer with pride, Mr. President, it was the United States of America!

In 1815, after a third of a century of fruitless effort, we concluded our present subsisting treaty of navigation and commerce with Great Britain, by which each of the contracting parties put the vessels of the other upon an equal footing with their own with respect to duties and charges. It was a radical innovation from the customary policy pursued by nations up to that time. It was a forerunner of the abolition of the old restriction and discrimination practiced toward each other by nearly all the maritime nations of the world. It was a great advance in international friendship and amity.

It is now insisted, because we have built a canal at a heavy cost, we shall, for a doubtful advantage, repudiate this great principle of reciprocal equality which we ourselves inaugurated and established as the great corner stone in the regulation of commercial relations between modern nations, and become the leader among the nations of the world in a reactionary movement to reestablish the old principle of selfishness and isolation which it supplanted.

But there is more of this history. For nearly one-half a century before the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we had periodically sought a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. We wanted to be released from the copartnership and arrangement of that treaty. We wanted the right to build and own the canal in severalty. We wanted the right to fortify and defend it. Repeatedly during these years we appealed through our State Department and otherwise to Great Britain for a modification of the treaty in these respects, and in these respects alone.

Let me impress upon you, Senators, the fact that in all of these communications, from that of Mr. Reeves to Lord Palmerston, 1853; that of Mr. Cass, in 1857; that of Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, in 1881; and those of Mr. Hay and others, while various other modifications were sought, there was never so much as a suggestion that this Government wanted or sought relief or release from the obligations of the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with reference to the free and equal passage of the ships of the world through the canal on equal terms with our own.

STATEMENT OF EX SECRETARY OF STATE JAMES G. BLAINE.

I wish, with the consent of the Senate, to have printed as an appendix to my remarks extracts from these official statements with regard to our purpose and position in this matter, as well as extracts from the diplomatic correspondence bearing upon the same subjects. I will not take the time of the Senate to read these extracts except the one from ex-Secretary James G. Blaine. I wish to read this statement of Mr. Blaine's because for 30 years he was a bright, particular star in our political firmament and because his brilliant and masterful account of the political and economic occurrence of that period in his work entitled "Thirty Years in Congress" establishes his right to speak with authority upon this subject. For these reasons I would especially invoke the authority of his great name in behalf of a fair and liberal interpretation of our written promises in this matter and an ungrudging performance of them in spirit as well as in letter.

Now, let me read to you, Senators, Mr. Blaine's significant and emphatic statement:

Nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees, and will by public proclamation declare, at the proper time, in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located, that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe; and equally in time of peace the harmless use of the canal shall be freely granted to the war vessels of other nations.

Mr. President, in all these years the first suggestion that we have any selfish motive on our part in this matter—that we wanted any preferential treatment for our own ships—that we did not accept in the fullest measure the rule of equality prescribed in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, was in 1912, when the canal was nearing completion, and then for the first time the voice of the new "dollar diplomacy," which came into being during the administration of President Taft and Secretary of State Knox, was heard pleading for preferential consideration for our ships—especially our coastwise ships—already enjoying special favors and exceptional privileges under our navigation laws.

Mr. President, it is now proposed to reverse this well-established policy, to repudiate all these assurances with respect to our purposes toward the commerce of other nations should we build the canal—and by a technical, not to say shrewd, ex parte interpretation of the letter of the contract establish our right to pursue a course of unrestricted discrimination in favor of our own ships engaged in coastwise or foreign trade.

CHANGE GUARANTORS DOES NOT AFFECT OR IMPAIR GENERAL PRINCIPLE.

To accomplish this purpose without properly repudiating the treaty, it becomes necessary to construe the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the general principles of neutrality as defined in it out of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The argument relied upon to support this construction is based upon two propositions.

First. The contention that the general principle of equality guaranteed in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is conditioned upon the stipulated guaranty of the joint protection of the canal wherever it should be decided to construct it, and that therefore the agreement for equality ceased to be effective when Great Britain was released from the obligation of protection.

Second. The contention that no part of article 8 of the old treaty is efficaciously incorporated in the new treaty.

Mr. President, article 8 embraces two propositions—one is the establishment of the general principle that the vessels of all nations, including those of the contracting parties, Great Britain and the United States, shall have the right of passage through the canal on terms of entire equality. This is the so-called principle of neutralization.

The other proposition is a stipulation for the joint protection of the canal, by whatever route constructed, by the United States, Great Britain, and other nations using it. These two propositions, though coupled as interdependent stipulations, are in fact separate and distinct things. The general principle of neutralization provided in this article is one thing and the guaranty of protection is quite another and different thing, and I submit that a change made in the personnel of the guarantors of protection by the mutual agreement of the contracting parties can in no way affect the validity of the general principle, especially when the agreement for a change of the guarantors is accompanied with an agreement for the retention of that principle.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty relieves Great Britain and all other foreign nations using the canal from the duty and obligation growing out of the stipulated guaranty of protection in article 8, and devolves that duty exclusively upon the United States; but it is stipulated that this change in guarantors shall not in any way impair or abridge the general principle of equality therein enunciated. On the contrary, the general principle is to remain intact, indeed, is reaffirmed, not only in the preamble but in article 4, and it is reiterated in the treaty with Panama by which we secured our title to the territory upon which the canal is built. In every way known to diplomacy it is asserted and buttressed.

MISCONSTRUCTION OF TREATY.

The opponents of repeal do not stop with the misconstruction of this article of the old treaty, and the effect of its modified incorporation in the new treaty, but to make assurance doubly secure they go further and seek by construction to eliminate it from the new treaty altogether. The ground upon which they seek to throw it out is the contention that the preamble in which it is first affirmed is not a part of the treaty except in so far as it may throw light upon the interpretation of any doubtful provisions; and that its reaffirmation in the fourth article does not make it a part of the treaty so far as the canal we have constructed is concerned, and that the treaty should therefore be construed as if it did not mention the general principle of neutralization or article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty at all. This is an amazing contention in view of the undisputed facts in connection with the negotiation of this treaty and its ratification by Great Britain. Speaking generally, there can be no question about the fact that while Great Britain yielded to our demands for the modification of the old treaty; to our demands for the right of exclusive construction, ownership, and management; to our demands in regard to the right of fortification, at every stage of the procedure, throughout all the conferences, she demanded that the general principle of neutrality embodied in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be retained in all of its vitality and vigor, and there was no dissent on the part of our negotiators or our Government. She made it plain through her representatives that unless that was retained and written in the treaty in such a way as to leave no doubt that it was retained that neither the cabinet, the Parliament, nor the people of Great Britain would consent to the modification which we sought of the original treaty.

In the light of these facts we are asked to accept the proposition implied, in the arguments advanced here, that the treaty was so unskillfully, so inartificially, so incompetently drafted as to leave out of it the only principle which Great Britain was specially anxious to put in it, and which, with the free hand in this behalf our representatives willingly accorded her, she tried in every known way to securely write into it and ingraft upon it.

"ALL NATIONS OBSERVING THESE RULES."

It will be interesting and helpful to examine for a moment the argument the opponents of repeal rely upon as conclusively proving their construction that the term "all nations" does not include the United States. This so-called conclusive argument is based upon the phrase "all nations observing these rules," used in the first clause of the third article. The use of these words, they contend, makes it clear and certain that the United States is not included in the words "all nations," because, they confidently assert, the maker of rules of action is under no obligation to observe them himself.

I do not wish to argue either the logic or morals of that proposition further than to express my dissent. But, Mr. President, these words which they claim excludes the United States from the all-nations provisions of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it will be noted, do not appear in the corresponding clause or elsewhere in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The language of that clause of the first treaty, is "The canal shall be free and open in times of war as in times of peace to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, upon terms of entire equality," and so on, and that clause of the treaty was adopted by an almost unanimous vote of the Senate when that treaty was ratified by that body.

If the insertion of the words "observing these rules" in the clause of the second treaty under discussion proves that the United States is not included in its "all nations" clause, their omission in the corresponding clause of the first treaty would seem to logically prove that the United States was included in the "all nations" clause of that treaty, and that its inclusion at that time was acceptable to the Senate.

WHO ASKED FOR THE INSERTION OF THESE WORDS?

It is important, in view of these facts, to inquire at whose instance the words "observing these rules," which did not appear in the first treaty, were inserted in the second treaty? Did Mr. Hay ask it? Did Mr. Choate ask it? The Senate certainly did not ask it. While many amendments were offered and several adopted to the first treaty, none to this effect were either offered or adopted. Who, then, asked it? The diplomatic correspondence answers: It was Lord Lansdowne who asked their insertion. He did not originally suggest the exact language used in the final draft. His original suggestion was "all nations agreeing to these rules." Neither Mr. Choate nor Mr. Hay desired the emendation. Mr. Choate strongly objected to the word "agreeing." He thought it might be construed to imply an invitation to foreign nations, which he did not wish his Government to make, and he suggested the word "observing" in place of the word "agreeing"; and that change of verbiage was accepted by Lord Lansdowne and the phrase was so worded.

So that we have the astonishing proposition that the British foreign office being offered a treaty which included the United States in the term "all nations," deliberately refused to accept it, and demanded an amendment the effect of which, it is contended, excludes the United States from the term "all nations," and produced the result the British negotiators had been so strenuously endeavoring to forestall and prevent.

The true purpose of the British Government in asking for inclusion of these words in this clause of the treaty is made clear by the diplomatic correspondence.

Lord Lansdowne evidently thought that the makers of these rules would be bound by them. He did not agree with Senators who now claim that the maker of these rules is not bound by them. Lord Lansdowne knew that his Government, being a party to the contract in which these rules were made, in legal intendment assented to the rules, and although it did not assume the obligation of enforcing them it was, by virtue of its assent and being a party to the contract in which they were promulgated, logically bound by them, and very naturally he insisted that other countries should not enjoy the benefit of the canal without being also bound to comply with them.

UNITED STATES DID NOT WANT GREAT BRITAIN'S HELP IN MAKING OR GUARANTEEING RULES.

The argument that, if the United States is included in the "all nations" provision of the first treaty, it is because in that treaty Great Britain and the United States jointly adopted rules of neutrality and jointly guaranteed those rules, and that the United States is not included in the "all nations" provision of the second treaty because under that treaty the United States alone adopted rules and guaranteed their observance is an argument which can not be sustained in the light of the facts of the case.

The United States did not want Great Britain to help in making these rules, or in guaranteeing them. On the other hand, the United States was almost, if not quite, as anxious to be relieved from the copartnership with Great Britain in making these rules and in protecting them as she was to be relieved from the copartnership with Great Britain provided in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in the construction of the canal. Great Britain was well aware of this feeling, and she knew she did not have to surrender anything, especially the only thing she had demanded for herself in connection with this whole business in order to secure release from the obligation of protection involved in the joint making of the rules of neutrality.

It is not reasonable to suppose that Great Britain consented to a change in the second treaty, which denied her ships equal treatment with those of the United States, in order to get release from an obligation from which she knew the United States was anxious to relieve her.

RIGHTS OF BELLIGERENCY.

Much stress is laid by those opposed to this bill upon the contention that if the five last rules of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty relating to belligerency do not apply to the United States equally with other nations, that likewise the first rule thereof relating to equal charges against vessels and merchandise passing through the canal do not apply to the United States.

The argument is plausible if you look only to the letter of the treaty, but in the light of the radical changes in the determinative facts respecting belligerency between the time of the making of that treaty and the building of the canal the argument is, I think, clearly unsound. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty antedated the Panama treaty by two years. When therefore these rules were prescribed we had not acquired sovereignty over the canal territory; nor indeed had it been settled where the canal would be located or whether the United States would build it or secure its construction by private capital under its auspices and protection. When, in 1903, the United States acquired sovereignty over the canal territory through the treaty with Panama that fact, coupled with the right to fortify it and the duty of policing it, settled our right to exercise belligerent rights for our own protection, and the right has never since been questioned by Great Britain or anyone else.

The common sense of mankind could not refuse to recognize the controlling effect of these changes in conditions upon the stipulations in the rules pertaining to belligerency. But with respect to rule 1, relating to equality in charges of the commerce passing through the canal, it is a question not of changed conditions, but it is a question of original construction.

Great Britain was promised that her commerce should be put upon an equal footing with the commerce of the United States in the matter of charges and conditions of transit through the canal. The fact that the United States as a result of subsequent acquisition built the canal through its own land instead of through the leased land of some one else does not in the least change the status or the interest of the two contracting parties in the matter of equal terms of transit.

The effect of discrimination against the commerce of Great Britain would be the same in the one case as in the other, and the effect upon the United States of equality of treatment would be the same in the one case as in the other.

In addition to this, Mr. President, it seems to me that the sovereignty argument is effectually disposed of by the provision in the fourth article to the effect that no change of territorial sovereignty of the country or countries traversed by the canal should affect the general principles of neutralization, which means the principle of equality of treatment prescribed in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

WELLAND CANAL.

It is said by the opponents of repeal that the Welland Canal case has no analogy to the case under consideration. This conclusion seems to be based upon the theory that Canada and Great Britain, after having refused to yield to our contention that they were proceeding in violation of our treaty rights, were ultimately persuaded by the retaliatory measures adopted by us to yield as a matter of policy, though not admitting our contention. I am not particularly concerned about Canada's attitude in that matter, or why she receded from her position. I do not think, so far as this controversy is concerned, it makes any difference whether she receded because of our retaliatory legislation, or because she finally become convinced that she did not have the right to disregard our construction of the contract with her, and to act upon her own construction. What I am concerned about in connection with this historical incident is what we ourselves did—the position that we took and maintained in that controversy—and whether, if we were right then, we are not wrong now. As I see it, our contention then was substantially the same as Great Britain's contention is now. We contended then that Canada, by virtue of its agreement through Great Britain with us, had promised equality of treatment to our commerce passing through her canal, and that by her order in council she had discriminated against our commerce in favor of her own commerce passing through the canal, and we asked that she desist from this discrimination. When she refused to desist, we resorted to retaliation. Great Britain has not gone that far, and we did not go that far for a long time. Whether Great Britain will eventually go that far is for the future to determine.

EFFECT OF CANADA'S ACTION ON HER RELATIONS WITH THE WORLD.

It is said that Canada has not suffered in her relation with the balance of the world by reason of her refusal to consider our protest and rescind her arbitrary order in council except under the pressure of retaliation. I am not so sure about that. There is in this Senate to-day an anti-British feeling—an anti-Canadian feeling. The same sentiment obtains with many throughout the country. Who will say what part this little episode in our history has played in keeping alive that feeling of irritation and hostility which has existed to a greater or less extent throughout our whole history against the one great nation of the world who is "bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh"? Who can say that but for this little incident there might not have been a different sentiment, if not a different relationship, between this country and our neighbor at the north from that which now exists and has obtained for years?

Suppose all the balance of the world had been interested in opposition to the action of Canada in this matter to the same extent as all the balance of the world is interested in opposition to our attitude with reference to the exemption from canal tolls of our coastwise vessels. Who in that case would undertake to measure the possible effect the action of Canada in the Welland Canal matter might have had upon the sentiments of amity and friendship of the balance of the world toward her and the extent to which her political and commercial fortunes might have been affected.

WE ARE SOVEREIGNS OF THE CANAL ZONE, BUT UPON WHAT ASSURANCES WAS IT ACQUIRED?

Elaborate arguments have been made to show that we own the Canal Zone—that our title and sovereignty over it is as complete as that over the ground upon which this Capitol is built. O Mr. President, I suppose we own this Canal Zone.

Let us dismiss all question about the legality of our title and sovereignty over the Canal Zone. Still the question remains, How did we get that title and acquire that sovereignty? I have no reference now to the secession of Panama from Colombia and her recognition by us and the balance of the world as an independent Republic. I refer solely to our acquisition of this 10-mile-wide strip of land from ocean line to ocean line through the very heart of her territory.

The $10,000,000 we paid for this strip of land and its appurtenances of inestimable value is a mere bagatelle compared with its actual value. The payment of this money was not the real consideration for this extraordinary territorial and political concession. The real consideration was the assurance and promise, ungrudgingly given by us and implicitly relied upon by Panama, that we would construct a canal through the center of this strip sufficient to accommodate the largest seagoing vessels and maintain and operate it in perpetuity, on terms of entire equality to the interoceanic commerce of the world, thus bringing this great world traffic through the eastern and western gateway and past the very doors of the little infant Republic.

GREAT BRITAIN NOT ALONE CONCERNED, BUT ALL THE WORLD.

This question has been discussed as if nobody was concerned in the guaranty of equality except Great Britain. Even Panama's rights have been ignored in order to more effectually twist the lion's tail. That is wide of the mark. Great Britain and Panama alone have contractual rights in this behalf, it is true, but all the world, under the terms of the treaty, are joint beneficiaries of the promises and guaranties made to these two countries.

If we should repudiate these guaranties, neither Great Britain nor Panama would go to war with us about it—neither would the other beneficiaries. But not only Great Britain and Panama, but all the balance of the world, would be disappointed in their just expectations. They would be aggrieved. They would be resentful. Their antipathy would be aroused and their distrust excited. And while we would not be confronted with a world in arms, we would be confronted with what would be equally as serious a matter to us in our political and commercial relations with mankind, namely, a world-wide public sentiment of chagrin, distrust, disapproval, and resentment.

What would be the effect of this situation upon our commercial and political relations with the balance of the world, especially with our neighbors of the American Continent, no man can foretell.

WHO WILL GET BENEFITS OF EXEMPTION.

Let me devote a few minutes to the question as to who will get the benefit of the remission of these tolls and its effect upon transcontinental railroad rates. Of course it is clear that exemption from tolls of coastwise vessels will take that much money out of the Treasury which the people will have to make good, but will the people in some other way get this money back? Will the shipowners appropriate it all to themselves or will they give it all to the shipper or to the consumer, or will they divide it up between themselves and the shipper and the consumer? Will it tend to the reduction of transcontinental railroad rates, as was suggested at the time the canal act was passed, or will it result simply in the transcontinental railroads hopelessly losing this trade to the new water route and recouping their losses by such increases as the Interstate Commerce Commission may allow under the circumstances upon rates to interior points?

From our experience with special privileges we may fairly assume that in this case, as in other cases, the consumer will get nothing except what the owners of the boats are absolutely compelled to allow him, and as whatever the consumer gets will first have to filter through the hands of the boat owner, the strong probability is that he will get about the same share of this subsidy as the consumers of tariff-taxed articles get from a prohibitive tariff.

SHIPPING TRUST AND CONFERENCE-MADE RATES.

Opponents of repeal ridicule the idea of a shipping trust in connection with the canal. According to them there is to be unrestricted competition for the benefit of the consumer. I do not know whether there is a shipping trust or not in our coastwise trade, but the evidence before the committee showed that these boats were now making enormous profits, paying big dividends, and, in some instances, annually carrying to surplus two or three times as much as the amount paid in dividends.

Experts assured the committee that if the combinations now alleged to exist between those boats were broken up, or if they were put under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, rates would hereafter be fixed, as are railroad rates and prices in other lines of competitive business, by conference agreements, and that the rates charged by all would likely be practically the same; and that these rates would be fixed just low enough to get the business, and that within that limitation they would be as much as the business would bear.

The exemption from tolls of our coastwise shipping, we are told, will reduce transcontinental railroad rates. That argument was greatly stressed two years ago. Since the hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals it has not been so much relied upon, because these hearings practically exploded it. Still much is sought to be made out of the opposition of these railroads to the canal, both before and since its construction.

It is true, Mr. President, that the railroads opposed the construction of the canal, and it is true that now that it is about to be opened for traffic they regard it as a menace to their prosperity.

I have no doubt many of them would rejoice if an earthquake should come and blow it up. Why did the railroads oppose the canal, and why do they still fear it? For the simple reason they know, as everybody knows, that, tolls or no tolls, the canal is going to cut enormously into their present business.

EFFECT OF WATER COMPETITION ON TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. Dunn, one of the star witnesses against repeal before the committee, calculated that of the 3,000,000 tons through traffic now carried by the transcontinental railroads, when the canal is opened, 2,000,000—or two-thirds of the amount—would be lost by the railroads to boats. This will result from the fact that the difference between the cost of transportation by water and rail would be so great that there could be no competition in such heavy and bulky articles as usually seek waterway transportation, and, competition being impossible, the railroads will simply let the business go. He estimated that by using petroleum instead of coal, lumber could be carried by water from the Pacific coast to New York for $4 per thousand, and other heavy and bulky things in like proportion. Manifestly, the railroads could not meet such competition, even though the toll charges were several times greater than is proposed. Would forcing the transcontinental railroads out of these lines of business result in a reduction of their freight rates upon the business which they would retain?

The boats can only carry the traffic from port to port. Relatively, only a small part of the coastwise trade passing through the canal will be consumed by the seaport cities. It will have to be distributed by the railroads. It is assumed that the back haul of this traffic will not extend much more than 500 miles from the coast. That will leave a strip outside of this back-haul zone—infinitely greater than the zone itself—stretching 2,000 miles across the continent and 1,500 miles up and down the continent, which will have to be supplied with coast products exclusively by the railroads, as at present. Will they be allowed to recoup the loss of revenue resulting from losing two-thirds of their through haul by an increase in the rates both upon the back haul and into the broad zone beyond the back haul? Doubtless they will increase these rates, and so recoup themselves if the Interstate Commerce Commission shall find it expedient to allow them to do so, in order that they may realize a reasonable profit and continue as going concerns.

Undoubtedly the canal will greatly stimulate traffic between our two coasts. It will be of inestimable benefit to this country, as well as to the world. It will operate, undoubtedly, to some extent in regulating rail rates. But its benefits will be greatest to our seaports and the country adjacent and commercially tributary to those ports. Indirectly all parts of the country will be benefited, but that there will be any appreciable reduction in transcontinental rail rates is exceedingly problematical, to say the least.

EXEMPTION HANDICAPS COMPETITION BETWEEN DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN WATER CARRIERS.

But let us look at this matter from another standpoint. You say you wish to reduce rail rates across the continent by establishing intercoastal water competition. Well, the canal will effectually do that without the remission of tolls. After securely establishing competition between these intercoastal carriers and the railroads by the construction of the interoceanic canal, do you want to protect these intercoastal vessels against competition with foreign vessels when both use the canal to reach the same ports of the United States? I would think not. Is it not clear that in exempting one and charging the other tolls on the basis of cargo tonnage you will not only embarrass but handicap competition between those competing water carriers, but you will also protect the domestic merchandise carried in intercoastal vessels against competition of foreign merchandise carried in foreign vessels through the canal and sold in United States ports just as effectively as if you imposed a protective tariff duty of $1.20 per ton on the merchandise imported in the latter in addition to the duty, if any, otherwise imposed by law?

NO SURRENDER OR ABRIDGMENT OF OUR RIGHTS INVOLVED.

It is said that the protest of Great Britain against our action in this tolls matter is a denial of our right to exempt our vessels from toll, and is therefore an impeachment of our right as the sovereign of the territory and owner of the canal to do as we please with respect to it. There is no foundation for these suggestions.

Great Britain does not deny our right to exempt our vessels from tolls; her position is exactly the reverse. She admits that right. She admits not only our right to pass our coastwise vessels but our over-sea vessels without the payment of tolls. She simply says, if we shall see fit to exercise that right, and exempt our vessels, that we have entered into a binding agreement with her to exempt hers also. Is that an impeachment of our sovereignty? If we should yield to her suggestion, would it be a surrender of our sovereignty? If so, then we have, in identically the same way and to the same extent, surrendered our sovereignty at least half a hundred times in the last 100 years to various and sundry nations of the earth. We have to-day, I think, 30, probably more, treaties of commerce and navigation with various and sundry nations of the world, by the terms of which we agree that we will accord to their vessels the identical treatment in our ports which we accord to our own vessels. If we should refuse to comply with the terms of these agreements, and they should protest, and we finally acquiesced in their contention, would anybody contend that that was a surrender of our sovereignty? Would anyone contend that they were officiously interfering with our affairs? That very thing has recently been done, and there was no clamor or outcry of base surrender.

It has been said that the present tariff law carries a differential of 5 per cent in favor of merchandise carried in American bottoms. That is true. There is such a provision in the present tariff law. But when it was made clear that it would be a discrimination against foreign vessels, in violation of our treaties of commerce, by which we agreed to accord equal treatment in our ports and harbors, we added a proviso to the effect that the differential should not apply to the vessels of any nation with which we had a treaty of this import. Was that a surrender of our sovereignty? Was the protest of certain nations, with which we had these treaties, an officious interference with our domestic affairs—an assault upon our sovereignty?

We could not do as we please in this matter because we had solemnly agreed to do otherwise; just as we can not do as we would please with reference to canal tolls, because we have solemnly agreed otherwise.

I will dismiss from consideration this talk about our surrender to Great Britain—this talk about Great Britain's attack upon our sovereignty—by quoting the language of ex-President Taft, when he said in his Ottawa speech—

> Now, we shall doubtless have to arbitrate the matter, unless Congress reverses itself. There are some hot-heads that talk in absurd tones about the right of the United States to manage her own canal and her own property as she likes, no matter what she has agreed to; but that is all froth. Those are the explosivistas.

PREFERENTIAL CANAL EXEMPTION NOT ANALOGOUS TO FREEDOM OF OUR DOMESTIC WATERS.

It is said that if canal exemption is a subsidy, so is the free use of our rivers and harbors, upon which we have spent millions upon millions, a subsidy. There is a clear differentiation between the two cases. We have spent enormously—probably twice as much in the course of our history in the development of our internal waterways as we have spent in the construction of the canal. From time immemorial these waterways have been free not only to our own people but to the world. We have discriminated against nobody. The money has been distributed as equally as is possible between all sections of the country. We have looked for compensation for the investment in the development and expansion of our trade and the accommodation of our commerce. We have adopted freedom in the use of these waterways as a matter of public policy, and it is, I think, a wise public policy. We have charged nobody for their use. If this is a subsidy, who, I ask, has been the recipient of the special favor which the idea of subsidy involves and presupposes?

If we proposed to pursue the same policy upon the canal, there would be no question of subsidy. We would look to the accommodation and enlargement of both our domestic and international trade for compensation. But the policy we have adopted is one of recoupment. The question is, Shall we apply the principle of equal treatment or of unequal treatment? Shall we require all vessels using the canal to pay their proportionate part of the burden, or shall we require a part to bear the whole cost and exempt a part from any contribution whatever? If we exempt a part, as is proposed by the opponents of repeal, then a special privilege will be accorded to that part, and a special privilege is what the public understand to be implied in the word "subsidy," although that may not be its technical meaning.

WE BUILT CANAL FOR THE WORLD, AND NOW WOULD FORCE THE BALANCE OF THE WORLD TO PAY FOR IT.

Much stress is laid upon the fact that we built the canal at a cost of $400,000,000 and must maintain it at an annual cost, exclusive of military operations, of some $17,000,000, and that we generously propose to let the world use it. Our magnanimity in this respect is much exploited. And yet if the policy which is insisted upon shall be pursued, if we shall exempt our shipping, coastwise and over-sea, from tolls while taxing that of the balance of the world, what will be the result? For a few years, of course, we would not realize enough to pay the cost of operation. In the beginning the Suez Canal did not pay. In less than 10 years, however, the Suez Canal was more than paying expenses; and it was not long before it was paying large dividends. To-day it is one of the greatest profit-earning properties in the world.

It will be likewise with the Panama Canal. What is the proposition with which we are now confronted? It is to exempt our vessels—not only our coastwise, but it is suggested by some that we have the right and should exempt our over-sea vessels as well—and throw the whole burden of maintaining the canal and amortizing the capital invested in its construction upon the balance of the world.

If this course is pursued, is it not manifest that in a comparatively short time, as time is counted in the life of a nation—if the history of the Suez Canal is paralleled with respect to the development of traffic, and it undoubtedly will be—that all the operating expenses of the canal, the $400,000,000 invested, together with interest, will have been returned to us, and this great property, with its world-wide clientele of paying customers, will be ours without having cost us a cent. This most wonderful accomplishment of the ages, which we boasted that we would build for the benefit of mankind and without any thought of self-gain, will in fact have been built by us not for the benefit of mankind, but, thanks to our shrewd construction of the treaty, will have been built by the rest of mankind for us and its vast unincumbered income turned over to us and our children in perpetuity.

DECENT RESPECT TO RIGHTS AND OPINIONS OF OTHERS.

Mr. President, Great Britain and the other commercial nations of Europe—Canada to the north of us and the countries of South and Central America to the south of us—believe that the act of 1912 reserving special treatment to our coastwise vessels through the canal discriminates against their vessels trading in competition with them in the various ports of our two coasts and therefore contravenes the treaty.

The President of the United States, responsible under the Constitution for the conduct of our foreign relations, has declared in a solemn message to Congress his maturely formed opinion that the discriminations in this act violate our treaty promises. The Secretary of State—equal to any of his predecessors in that great office—who acts for the President in all matters pertaining to our foreign relations, is understood to agree with him in the opinion expressed in his message. The exact per cent of the division no one knows, but all will admit that a large portion of our own people also believe that this act violates our treaty obligations.

If we had the undisputed right to construe the treaty as our own interests may suggest, without regard to the construction of others interested in it, either contractually or otherwise, in the light of this division of opinion among our own people—to say nothing about the adverse attitude of the world—can we afford to pursue a course which the President, who has been chosen by the people to represent our Government in its foreign relations, in an official utterance declares is in contravention of a contract we have made with a friendly nation, and in the performance of which all maritime nations of the world are interested? Is it not, in these conditions, the course of wisdom, while expressly reserving all our rights under the treaty, to restore the original status quo, leaving the disputed question unembarrassed by the ex parte action of either party, to be settled in such way and manner as such differences between friendly nations should be settled, and can only be satisfactorily settled?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? There being none, the Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section at the end of the bill as follows:

SEC. 3. If any nation shall provide by law or regulation for the payment of any part of the tolls of the vessels of its citizens passing through the canal, or if the vessels of any nation or its citizens shall be granted any other form of subsidy bonus or rebate on account of such vessels passing through the canal, the President of the United States shall by proclamation increase the tolls of such vessels above the amount provided for in this act by an amount equal to the sum so received or to be received by such vessels by virtue of such law or regulation or on account of such subsidy bonus or rebate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have here a very carefully prepared article on the coastwise traffic and its relation to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from the New York Sun of May 23, 1914. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

COASTWISE SHIPPING—PART OF DOMESTIC COMMERCE AND NOT SUBJECT TO THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

To the EDITOR OF THE SUN.

SIR: I have read with great interest much that has appeared in the Sun and in other publications regarding the canal-tolls matter now in dispute between the United States and the whole world.

It appears certain that we entered into very solemn agreement with Great Britain by treaty regarding our administration of the canal, and for us to break the conditions of such a treaty would leave us beyond the pale of civilized nations. For this treaty, being a fundamental condition to the construction of the canal across the Isthmus of Panama, can not after the canal is built be changed or abrogated excepting by the consent of both parties to it. This Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in that it was a preliminary condition necessary to the construction of a permanent waterway, and since that waterway was built, as it has been built, because of the consummation of this contract, is not analogous with ordinary treaties governing commercial and diplomatic relations that have no permanent form and no physical existence. Therefore the Hay-Pauncefote treaty must be considered as a permanent fact of international law rather than a temporary engagement established by virtue of such international law.

The only possible ground for debate must be in the interpretation of this treaty and in definition of those subjects which may properly be the subject of a treaty between two powers where no specific mention is made of them.

It may be supposed generally that those things never subject to treaty are not subject to this Hay-Pauncefote treaty unless specifically mentioned therein, while those things which have always been acknowledged to be subject to treaties and that have been the actual subjects of treaty, specifically and by inference, many times are logically included by implication, even if not specifically mentioned.

Now, among the many things that are seldom, if ever, subject to any treaties whatever is domestic commerce or internal commerce of a sovereign power. In its entirety and separated into its component parts internal commerce has scarcely ever been by specific mention or by implication the subject of treaties among the great powers or between one of these powers and one of the smallest of the weaker and lesser States. So that it is only reasonable to premise that American domestic commerce is not included, either as a whole or in part, by implication or supposition, as it surely is not by specific mention, in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. And this must apply whether this domestic commerce uses as a channel the Panama Canal or goes around the Horn, or uses the rivers and lakes and railroads of the country. So long as the internal or domestic commerce of the United States has never been the subject of a treaty, or even so long as it has not been commonly the subject of a treaty, the weight of reasonable supposition is that it was not a subject of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, rather than that it was such.

That our coastwise commerce is part of our domestic or internal commerce seems to be almost beyond dispute, for only as such could it be reserved to American ships in the strict manner that it is reserved by our laws to the complete disadvantage and exclusion of all foreign ships. Nor is this reservation of coastwise commerce as a part of the domestic commerce unique with the United States. Every other nation in the world reserves its coastwise commerce for special control and regulation as being exclusively the nation's personal affair and not at all a matter of international or alien interest. And no nation has relinquished this control by treaty or otherwise, so far as I know.

On the other hand, if this coastwise commerce is not domestic commerce, therefore excluded from all modification by treaty with a foreign power, the passage of vessels plying in the coastwise trade through the canal is a more flagrant breach of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty than the tolls-exemption measure contemplated, since the exemption from tolls is a far smaller discrimination in favor of American shipping than is the drastic coastwise-shipping act under which our coasting vessels now sail from port to port.

Coastwise shipping must be either domestic commerce, and therefore not subject to any foreign treaty obligations, unless specifically mentioned, or else it must be external, or foreign commerce, and therefore subject to all the provisions of all the treaties with foreign powers covering navigation in general. Where so much is left to inference and "interpretation," as in this controversy arising out of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the first duty of everyone is to arrive at clear definitions of all the elements of the debate. And the most important matter to define first of all is the status of our coastwise commerce, either as part of our internal or domestic commerce or as no such thing, for it can not be treated as half one and half the other.

To many of us it seems that there is no ground for debate as to what our coastwise commerce is. And until the construction of the canal there was no one to raise the question. Nor is it now raised directly. Yet the whole controversy of the tolls seems to rest upon just this alone, whether the coastwise commerce of the country is foreign or domestic deep sea, and so a world question, or internal, and so only a national one.

The canal was built by the United States primarily to serve as a means of communication between the extreme East and the extreme West of our country, if the purpose of its construction has any place in the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Its service to all the world for all the world's commerce was for us a secondary consideration. Should it be determined that our coastwise commerce is really deep sea and not domestic commerce, as is implied by those who attempt to place it under the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, then the only way in which our coastwise commerce could use the canal and preserve the conditions of the treaty would be for us to throw open our coastwise commerce to the ships of all nations equally with those of the United States, for otherwise there would be discrimination of the most flagrant kind between ships using the canal. Our only other recourse would be for our coastwise ships, plying between two American ports on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, to go around the Horn or through the Straits of Magellan, never using the canal at all. There can be no logical middle ground in this matter of fixing the status of our coastwise commerce, which we are doing really in the guise of defining the scope of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; it comes under the provisions of that treaty either fully or not at all.

Another question comes up here as well, bearing upon the status of our coastwise commerce—that is, the provision restricting the use of the canal by the ships owned by railroad corporations. How else but on the premise that our coastwise shipping is part of our domestic commerce can such a provision be enacted or enforced? Premise that this coastwise commerce is anything but domestic commerce and this enactment directed against railroad-owned ships is impossible. It is a proof of the real attitude we hold toward this part of our shipping. Yet we can employ this position to damage American use of the canal, while we refuse to employ it in greater justice to give advantages to American use of it. This is the illogicality of the position taken by the supporters of equal tolls for all shipping using the canal applied in practice. If this Hay-Pauncefote treaty applies at all to our coastwise shipping, then it must apply to our control of that shipping itself, in discrimination against a portion of it.

We have no other honorable course than to fulfill all the provisions of the treaty which forms a fundamental condition of the existence of the canal and to fulfill these provisions for all time to come. But we must construe these conditions and provisions with common sense and logic, according to the accepted laws among nations. And the first step in so doing must be to determine whether our coastwise commerce is or is not part of our domestic commerce. For if it is part of our domestic commerce, then it can not be subject to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, since our domestic commerce is in no way mentioned or referred to in that treaty; while if it is not part of our domestic commerce, then it is wholly subject to that treaty, and therefore can not rightly use the canal at all under the present laws governing it, without any reference to tolls whatever.

VILLA BOSCOBELLO, Florence, Italy, May 5.

Mr. VARDAMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the Senator from Mississippi to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

WOOL PRICES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, at the time the recent tariff bill was under discussion ruin was predicted for the woolgrowers of the country. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD statements as to the wool market from the woolgrowing section of my State. These consist of a clipping from the Portland Oregonian of March 28, 1914, and one of the 22d of May, 1914, and one from the East Oregonian of the same date, published at Pendleton, showing conditions and prices both before and after the shearing season.

The first two clippings are from the leading Republican paper of the State and the last from a leading Democratic paper in the heart of the woolgrowing section of eastern Oregon.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Portland Oregonian, March 28, 1914.]

WOOL SALES LARGE—ACTIVE MARKET FOR NEW CLIP IN WASHINGTON—KOSHLAND HEAVY BUYER—TRANSFERS TO DATE AMOUNT TO ABOUT 1,250,000 POUNDS—PRICES RANGE FROM 12 TO 18 CENTS—NO OREGON CONTRACTING.

The most active wool market in the Northwest is in Washington, particularly in the Yakima section, where growers have been selling freely during the past week. In eastern Oregon trading is at a standstill. Buyers are anxious to contract wool, but growers are firm and holding out. Shearing in the eastern counties will not begin before the middle of April, and it is not likely there will be much doing in the way of buying before that time.

Isidore Koshland, who has just returned to this city from Yakima, where he was a heavy buyer, said:

"The only shearing in the Northwest has been in the Yakima Valley. The wool is selling as fast as shorn, and buyers are even making contracts for wool on the sheep's back where the clip is known to be good. Sales have been made at North Yakima, Kiona, Toppenish, Kennewick, Prosser, Mabton, Sunnyside, and other points.

"Altogether about 1,250,000 pounds of Washington wools have been sold to date. The prices, which ranged from 12 to 18 cents, were about the same as last year, in some instances a little more and in others a little less. The growers are well satisfied with the prices they received. The clip is by far the best for several years in point of quality, condition, and length of staple.

"There has also been some shearing along the Columbia River, but on the S. P. & S. shearing will not be general until the middle of April. One of the largest deals in Washington wool was the sale of the Hartley clip of about 125,000 pounds at Kahlotus."

Mr. Koshland, who is going back to Washington in a few days to make further purchases, has secured the following clips:

WOOL HIGHER THAN FOR MANY YEARS—IN SOME INSTANCES PRICES HAVE NOT BEEN EXCEEDED SINCE 1897.

The high prices being paid by wool contractors in parts of the West are said to be the top level since 1897, on the average. Appreciation of this may be had, according to a mail report from Boston yesterday, when it is considered that former prices were under a duty of 11 cents per pound on foreign wool. Without this protection, growers are said recently to have secured the highest prices for 17 years. In fact, the case is cited of a clip being sold this year at 17 cents upon which an offer of 14½ cents was withdrawn in 1913 at shearing time. Other bids of that year for this clip were around 12½ cents, and it ultimately was consigned to the market for selling by a dealer. An eastern wool writer says: "All this brings us back to the fact that nothing but continued firmness abroad can justify the situation. Dealers will not be able to turn over these later-bought wools except by advancing prices even beyond the recent local increases, which would bring them up against a snag in the event of any weakening in foreign wools. As it is, manufacturers are in danger of foreign competition, and must practice economy in some direction, so they will naturally hang back as far as possible from paying more for their raw material."

WOOL PRICES ARE HIGH—FIGURES EQUALED ONLY TWICE BEFORE IN 25 YEARS—TOTAL OF 500,000 POUNDS OF UMATILLA COUNTY'S CLIPS CHANGES HANDS—EVERY CLIP OFFERED IS SOLD.

PENDLETON, OREG., May 21.

Only twice before in 25 years has Umatilla County wool sold for prices equal to those secured by Pilot Rock growers at the public sale held in that place to-day.

This was the first public sealed-bid sale held in Oregon this year. More than 500,000 pounds changed hands. Every clip offered was sold.

The prices received ranged as much as 5¼ cents in advance of the prices paid for the same clips last year.

An unusual feature of the sale was the fact that the "fine wool" clip of the J. E. Smith Co. topped the market at 19⅝ cents. As a rule the "coarse" wool brings the higher price.

The following is the list of the growers, with the amounts sold and prices received:

Cunningham Co., 110,000 pounds, at 18 cents; Pat Doherty, 40,000 pounds (coarse), at 19 cents; Pat Doherty, 10,000 pounds (fine), at 17⅝; S. G. Jones, 18,000 pounds, at 16¾; A. P. Warner, 9,000 pounds at 17½; C. W. Matthews, 15,000 pounds, at 18½; Rugg Bros., 9,000 pounds, at 19½; K. G. Warner, 60,000 pounds, at 18⅝; A. A. Cole, 49,000 pounds, at 18⅝; Andy Rust, 28,000 pounds, at 18¾; Morgan Edwards, 12,000 pounds, at 18; Joe Pedro, 40,000 pounds, at 18½; Charles Johnson, 36,000 pounds, at 18½; J. E. Smith Co., 65,000 pounds, at 19⅝ (this is 5¼ cents higher than the price bid for this clip last year).

The Cunningham clip, the largest sold, brought 4 cents more than last year.

IMPOVERISHING THE SHEEPMEN.

At the Pilot Rock wool sale yesterday the J. E. Smith Livestock Co. sold their fine wool at 19⅝ cents per pound. The price was 5¼ cents more than the price offered for the same wool a year ago, when the high tariff law was still in effect. The price was 2½ cents higher than the price paid for the same wool in May, 1912, before the presidential election had occurred and before anyone knew the tariff would be revised.

The Cunningham Sheep & Land Co., of which company Senator J. N. Burgess is manager, sold its fine wool yesterday at 18 cents per pound. That price was 4 cents more than the price paid for the same wool a year ago and 1½ cents more than the price paid in May, 1912.

There could not be a more striking refutation of the old campaign chestnut that to remove the tariff on wool would bring ruin and poverty upon the sheepmen. Last September the tariff was absolutely removed, and the country now has free trade in wool. Yet, instead of ruin, our sheepmen get the highest prices they have had in years. The Smith Co. gets 5¼ cents more for wool than a year ago, when the tariff was in force, and the Cunningham Co. sold its fine wool at 4 cents more than the 1913 price. The wool buyers have been more feverish to get wool this spring than for many seasons past. The sheep market is likewise stronger than in several years. In other words, the sheepmen of eastern Oregon are actually in clover, when they were led to believe they would be facing the poorhouse.

Where now are the calamity howlers? Where are the newspapers that prophesied ruin and bankruptcy for the sheepmen when Schedule K was amputated. Now is the time for them to come to the front and explain wherein our sheepmen are being impoverished by being paid 4 and 5 cents a pound more for their wool than they received when the high tariff was in force.

What has become of the earthquake?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this connection I desire to say to the Senator from Oregon that the world price of wool to-day is about three times what it was in 1894. There is a shortage of about 240,000,000 pounds of wool in the world's production for the last year, and on account of that shortage there is a great demand for it all over the world and the prices are exceedingly high.

I simply make this statement to have it understood that if the conditions were the same in the world's wool market to-day that they were in 1894 there would be no such articles presented to the Senate. If there was a duty on wool, the woolgrower would be getting higher prices than he is getting to-day.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for a moment?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will yield to the Senator for a moment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will merely say that those conditions were not particularly called to the attention of the Senate when the tariff bill was passed, but ruin was predicted no matter what the world's condition might be, and the woolgrowers, according to the prophets of disaster, were going to be put entirely out of business throughout the West. Notwithstanding these predictions, the prices of wool in my State are higher than they have been in 25 years with the exception of 2 years in all that time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I would very much prefer that this discussion should take place after I shall have concluded.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not ask the Senator to yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator has anything he wants to say, I shall yield to him.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not ask the Senator to yield.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, when the Democrats met in national convention at Baltimore on the 25th day of June, 1912, every thoughtful member of that organization recognized the fact that a crisis confronted the party. The long and uninterrupted tenure of the Republican Party, with its special privileges and favoritism, had so offended the public conscience and outraged the public judgment, that a change was inevitable. But just where the dissatified voter would go, the work of this Democratic convention would largely determine. There was a feeling of unrest among the voters of the country. New leaders were springing up. Discord prevailed in the ranks of the Republican Party, and a new hive was about to be formed. The political atmosphere in the city of Baltimore was charged with the electric current of change, as it were. The delegates wore an expression of anxiety, and the gravity and importance of the situation was perceptible to the most casual observer.

In the organization of the Democratic convention a few inharmonious elements served to disturb the serenity of its proceedings, but finally the common sense of most prevailed, order came out of chaos, and turmoil gave way to proper procedure. A platform of principles was adopted which, to my mind, was the most Democratic of all documents of its character that had been proclaimed by a political party since the days of Thomas Jefferson.

At the suggestion of the former leader of the party, Hon. W. J. Bryan, the platform was not reported to the convention by the committee on resolutions until the candidate for President was selected. This unusual course was followed for the reason, as expressed by Mr. Bryan, that we did not want an issue to arise during the campaign which was to follow between the platform and the candidate nominated for President. Finally, however, the candidate for President was nominated, the platform completed—it having received the unanimous indorsement of the convention—the candidate for Vice President chosen, the convention adjourned, and the delegates returned to their respective homes full of hope, in high spirits, and the determination to win the election the following November.

We had nominated a man for President who, although of short political career and with limited experience in practical politics, enjoyed the prestige of a brilliant record as governor of his State, a scholar of rare finish, a historian of profound and accurate learning, and an orator of great force and charm, whose genius for expression fitted him for the great campaign which he was now called upon to make.

Mr. President, it seemed to me that from the moment the campaign opened victory for the Democracy was assured. Triumphantly elected, Woodrow Wilson entered the White House with the almost unanimous approval of the American people. Such unanimity of approving sentiment has rarely happened to encourage a man in the performance of the great work which President Wilson was undertaking. Then the Congress met, fresh from the people—the source of all political power in this Republic. Do not forget that. It was an auspicious and also an inspiring spectacle. The President's inaugural address was well worthy of the patriotism and scholarship of its author. It breathed a spirit of love of country, of lofty purpose, and indicated a comprehensive grasp of the great questions which were to engage the attention of the Congress. In pursuance of platform promises, the tariff was the first, the paramount, problem to be solved. After long and patient effort on the part of the Congress, stimulated and encouraged, sustained and assisted, by the approval and wise counsel of the Executive, that epoch-making bill in the course of time became the law. Then close upon the heels of the tariff bill followed the currency bill. This latter measure, though unique in character, with no precedent in American annals to guide the legislative body in its deliberations, a magnificent monumental measure, was constructed and put upon the statute books. It is a measure which, if wisely enforced and faithfully construed, will prove to be an almost infinite benefaction to the American people. It is a safe and sure check upon the commercial pirate and the financial bandit that haunt the great money centers of this Republic.

Up to this time the Democratic Party had fulfilled its promises. A grateful and appreciative constituency freely gave it the meed of unstinted praise and approval, and the banner of Democracy floated triumphantly upon the breeze. It had done well. Hope filled the hearts of the adherents of that party throughout the Nation, and the prospect for the future grew brighter and brighter with each succeeding day. We had kept the faith. We had shown our capacity for government. We had put to shame our traducers and slanderers who were wont to say that the Democratic Party could always be "relied upon to do the wrong thing at the right time"; that it was "deficient in constructive statesmanship," and for that reason its supremacy must necessarily be ephemeral. A part of the program had been carried out with consummate skill and fidelity. But, Mr. President, in the midst of this inspiring situation, with not a cloud as large as a man's hand upon the political horizon, when the sun of hope was at meridian height, with every Democrat in the Nation in fighting mood and the enemy disappointed, rent in warring factions and on the run, like a fire bell whose disturbing tones rend the somnolent air of night, the word went out that, in defiance of the pledges made in the Baltimore platform, in defiance of the notable speech made by the candidate on the Democratic ticket during the campaign, in spite of our boasted protestations of undeviating and unfailing loyalty to campaign promises, the President had resolved upon an entirely new policy of his own, formed without consultation with his party, and proclaimed without the consent of the people who had elected him, so far as the Panama Canal tolls question is concerned—a policy that involved a direct and complete repudiation of that part of the platform which exempts from the payment of tolls American ships engaged in coastwise trade.

Mr. President, when I first heard it suggested that the President might take this unfortunate step, I did not give it serious consideration. I could not believe it. But when I heard it from his own lips I was amazed. I was dumbfounded; I doubted the veracity of my own ears; I could not think it possible that one who had given such hearty approval to the plank in the platform which he now asked the Congress to repudiate—I could not believe that one who had spoken such scorching words of condemnation of those who failed to keep their platform promises—I could not, Mr. President, understand how the President could now ask others to do the very thing which he had so unsparingly condemned. The President gave no valid reasons for the change of front which he demanded that Congress should make. He advanced no arguments. No facts were submitted. He did not even admit his own error of judgment or give a reason for his change of heart. But with an assurance unbecoming—I use the term with great respect—of one so learned and clothed with such rare accomplishments, he asks the Congress, a coordinate branch of the Government, to repudiate its promises, which would involve a betrayal of the voters of the country, subordinate their own judgments, and yield to his wishes on this important question, without even inquiring as to whether the things they were doing were right or wrong.

Mr. President, fidelity to platform promises has through all the years of our national life been the foundation of our party system, and the cornerstone of American political morality has been the faith which the people placed in the integrity of those who pledged, in exchange for their votes, the assurance that the promises of the party platform would be faithfully carried out. The idea of any one human being, however great in his own conceit or wise in the estimation of others, imagining that he has the power to absolve himself from such a pledge in order to substitute some theory of his own in place of it is a heresy in political religion in the United States which is now being preached and practiced by the leaders of the Democratic Party for the first time. It may be treason to the crown, but I can not approve it. I will not subscribe to such a doctrine. I regard a platform promise as a political confession of faith, and just as binding upon the servants of the people as the oath which a Senator takes when he enters this Chamber and assumes the duties of his great office. It is conceivable that contingencies may arise which would justify a violation of platform promises, but such contingencies have not arisen in this case and are not likely to arise out of the question at issue. I can not believe that any power in the world short of the people themselves has a right to absolve one from a solemn promise given to the people in exchange for their votes, cast on the strength of a definite pledge. To take any other view of this matter would render nugatory and vain all platform utterances and immunize men elected to office upon such platforms from the shame and disgrace of the crime of treachery, for which they should be punished.

Mr. President, since there is no power short of the people themselves that can absolve a President, a Representative, or a Senator from a solemn pledge given in writing or by word of mouth upon the hustings directly to them in consideration for their suffrage, I must decline to be a party to this repudiation of the Baltimore platform until I have an opportunity to consult the people, to whom I owe first allegiance, on the subject, and permit them, if they see fit, to absolve me from my promise to them.

Having been a member of the Baltimore convention and a member of the committee on platform, I think it would not be out of place for me to give my recollection of the adoption of this plank, which reads as follows:

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

As to who proposed the plank, I can not now recall. I am advised, however, that probably the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] suggested it. In its original form railroad-owned ships were not prohibited from using the canal, as I remember, but in the discussion generally the advantages to the people which would result from prohibiting railroad-owned ships from passing through the canal and thereby destroying the healthy competition with the transcontinental railroad lines, which the free-tolls plank was intended to bring about, Mr. Bryan, who was always watchful and solicitous of the interests of the toiling masses, suggested an amendment which prohibited railroad-owned ships from passing through the canal. It was an admirable suggestion; and, like almost every other suggestion made by the distinguished citizen from Nebraska, it was promptly accepted by the committee. The purpose of this plank was manifest. Free tolls to ships engaged in coastwise trade was to lower freight rates and thereby promote the interests of the consumer. Nobody then questioned the purpose of the free-tolls plank. Nobody regarded it as a subsidy in the interest of the Shipping Trust.

Let us stop for a moment and ponder the well-selected words and clearly expressed ideas of candidate Wilson on this subject. We find this great scholar, statesman, and patriot on the 16th day of August, 1912, at Washington, N. J., pleading with an audience of farmers in behalf of the Democratic Party and in the interest of beneficent government. Mr. Wilson stood squarely on the Baltimore platform, and the most persuasive, the most meritorious plank that he could plant himself upon was the free-tolls plank in the platform: He said:

> One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports; to allow all the farmers on what I may, standing here, call this part of the continent, to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast or down the coast or down the coast of South America.
> Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate, as it had passed the House—provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you?

And then the crowd applauded. They saw it. It struck a responsive chord in the minds of the honest, patient, patriotic tillers of the soil. The earnest, patriotic candidate was telling the unvarnished truth, and the silent, long-suffering, patient multitude applauded. But that was not all that candidate Wilson said. Continuing, he gave them the reason why railroad-owned ships should not go through the canal. Listen:

> We don t want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent. * * *

The argument was a clincher. It was unanswerable. The speech delivered that day was seed sown upon fertile soil, and the harvest was many trustful votes. Mr. Wilson told the farmers more than that. He said further:

> Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not willing to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not. They know the American people are taking notice in a way which they never took notice before—> and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to a very quiet and private retreat.
> Mark that—

Weigh those words. You may have an opportunity to refer to them in the very near future.

Was anything said about subsidy to ships? Does anybody believe that candidate Wilson thought of subsidy then or cares for subsidy now? There was no intimation in that confidential heart-to-heart conversation with the farmers about this plank being put into the platform in the interest of the Shipping Trust. Mr. President, I am afraid that Senators who prate so much about subsidy are not as ingenuous as they should be. Does anybody believe that there is a Democrat in Congress who would have raised the question of subsidy if the honorable senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] had not suggested repeal and the President followed suit? No; they do not. To believe that candidate Wilson thought it was a subsidy and in the interests of the Shipping Trust and gave it his indorsement in words so carefully selected and sentences so maturely formed is a reflection upon his morality and intellectual honesty, which I am sure his bitterest enemy does not approve. You can not conceive of this great scholar, this writer of books, and good books, this man familiar with the story of the rise and fall of nations and the growth and decay of civilization and empires, learned in the science of government, master of political economy, and gifted with such rare genius for expression—does anyone believe for a moment that these words were uttered without being carefully weighed and accurately measured? No; you do not. He understood what he was saying, and there was truth in what he said then, and there is as much truth in it now as there was then. It is a singular thing, I am advised, that every Democratic Senator who spoke upon this question, both in the Senate in 1912 and on the stump during the campaign, interpreted the platform just as the candidate for President had interpreted it. They approved the measure in all of its phases, "economic, ethical, and political." I voted for the free-toils plank in the platform, because I wanted to reduce the cost of living. I wanted to make it cheaper for the American people to get their goods to market. I voted for it for the reason that I am going to vote in the Senate for the rivers and harbors bill, which carries an enormous appropriation to be used in improving the navigation of the rivers, dredging the harbors, deepening the canals, and buying more canals, because I believe the Government is justified in making this great outlay, this great expenditure of money, that commerce between the States may be facilitated and transportation cheapened.

It might be proper, Mr. President, for me to state, in this connection, that as an original proposition, after consultation with my constituents, I think I should be in favor of having our ships pay the actual cost of transporting them through the canal, I am opposed to special privileges or governmental favoritism of any kind. But that is not the question involved in this controversy. A larger and more important question is involved than the mere matter of dollars and cents. The President has made the issue, and sovereignty over the canal is the question we are called upon now to determine. But I shall come to that later.

Mr. Bryan did not regard the free-tolls plank in the platform as a declaration in favor of subsidy when he moved to amend the proposition so as to prohibit railroad-owned ships from passing through the canal. He did not see then the economic heresy that now disturbs his patriotic heart. He thought that he was rendering a distinct service to the wealth-producing masses of the American people, whose devoted friend Mr. Bryan had always been.

Mr. President, as a matter of fact to pass ships engaged in coastwise trade through the canal free of tolls is not a subsidy in the sense in which that term is usually employed. It is no more a subsidy than that which the ships which ply the rivers of the United States enjoy; it is no more a subsidy than the free use of our canals and harbors, which are dug and dredged and kept in order at the expense of the United States Government. I can not help but think that the subsidy argument is an afterthought, rather an unfortunate expedient resorted to in order to justify the betrayal of a pledge. It is not complimentary to the candor, ingenuousness, and straightforward course which usually characterizes the discussion of a great question in this body.

Mr. President, the canal has cost an enormous amount of money. Before it is completed I have no doubt that quite half a billion dollars will be expended upon it. It was a stupendous undertaking. It is a marvelous achievement; the greatest piece of civil engineering the world has ever known. Somebody has very happily said that "it is the greatest liberty that man has ever taken with nature." An interoceanic canal has been the dream of the wise men for more than a hundred years. The great German poet Goethe discussed it away back in the early morning of the last century. It will not be out of place to quote his observations. He said:

> Humboldt has with a great knowledge of his subject given other points where, by making use of some streams which flow into the Gulf of Mexico, the end may be, perhaps, better attained than at Panama. All this is reserved for the future and for an enterprising spirit. So much, however, is certain, that if they succeed in cutting such a canal that ships of any burden and size can be navigated through it from the Mexican Gulf to the Pacific Ocean innumerable benefits would result to the whole human race, civilized and uncivilized. But I should wonder if the United States were to let an opportunity escape of getting such work into their own hands. It may be foreseen that this young State, with its decided predilection to the West, will, in 30 or 40 years, have occupied and peopled the large tract of land beyond the Rocky Mountains. It may furthermore be foreseen that along the whole coast of the Pacific Ocean, where nature has already formed the most capacious and secure harbors, important commercial towns will gradually arise for the furtherance of a great intercourse between China and the East Indies and the United States. In such a case it would not only be desirable but almost necessary that a more rapid communication should be maintained between the eastern and western shores of North America, both by merchant ships and men-of-war, than has hitherto been possible with the tedious, disagreeable, and expensive voyage around Cape Horn. I therefore repeat that it is absolutely indispensable for the United States to effect a passage from the Mexican Gulf to the Pacific Ocean, and I am certain that they will do it.

It will be noticed that this farsighted seer, who dipped into the future far as human eye could see, saw the vision of the world and the canal just as it would be in 1914, and he dwelt upon the importance of the canal being an American enterprise, the property of the United States. Well, it is the property of the United States. The United States expended their money for it; they furnished the genius to direct its construction; the necessary sacrifice of blood and treasure was made in order that the world might enjoy this great highway of commerce. It is practically finished; and since the work has been accomplished, as it has been accomplished, the question is now raised, Shall the builders and owners control it?

I am not going to enter upon an extended discussion of the treaty. That has been so thoroughly and completely covered by men more able than myself that any effort on my part to further illuminate the subject would be vain and unavailing. To my mind, after most careful and deliberate consideration, I have no doubt that the United States are well within their rights when they propose to exempt their ships engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. Indeed, I believe that they have the right to exempt all their ships from the payment of tolls. I agree most thoroughly with the conclusions reached by Dr. Hannis Taylor, an eminent authority on international law, a man of great learning, wide observation, and large experience. Mr. Richard Olney, the foremost lawyer of the New England bar, a diplomat of consumate skill and ability, believes that we have the right, under the treaty, to exempt our ships engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. Mr. LODGE, the senior Senator from Massachusetts, a man of ripe scholarship and erudition, of large legislative experience, and a diplomat of learning, believes that we have the right under the treaty to exempt American ships engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. Ex-President Taft, an accomplished lawyer, whose connection with this controversy gave him a coign of vantage from which he might view it in such a way as to discover the truth, believes that we have the right, under the treaty, to exempt our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls. Mr. Knox, the Secretary of State under President Taft, who directed some of the negotiations, is also a lawyer of great ability; a diplomat of training, of skill, and sound judgment; and he agrees with the distinguished gentlemen whom I have just mentioned. I could go on, Mr. President, and name a number of others of equal merit, equal learning, equal patriotism, equally altruistic in the spirit of their utterances bearing upon this question. But, notwithstanding the consentient sentiment entertained by the learned men to whom I have referred, there are men equally learned, equally patriotic, who hold different opinions, and in that way an issue has arisen. England has mildly protested that the exemption of our ships from the payment of tolls is a violation of our treaty obligations.

Mr. President, nations, like individuals, should respect the rights and opinions and pay proper attention to the demands of others. I am one of those who believe that the same code of morals should control nations in their intercourse with each other that men demand their fellows to observe in their dealings with each other. We can not ignore the opinion of our fellows, if honestly and justly entertained. A contingency has arisen which must be met, and met in the proper way. It is the duty of the President and of the Congress of the United States to protect the interest of the American people in this controversy. But in protecting the interest of the American people and upholding the rights of the American Government we should not forget that we protect ourselves best when we recognize and respect the rights of others.

The British Government evidently believes that some of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty have been violated. There are three questions involved in this controversy—the sovereignty of the United States Government over the canal, the rights of the British Government in the canal, and the binding obligation of party platform promises. The President and the Congress are to settle these questions. Can it be done to the satisfaction of all parties to the controversy? I believe it can.

We can not afford to be unjust to England. We can not afford to surrender any rights that belong to our own Government; and above and beyond all, as high as the heavens hang above the earth, we can not afford to betray the trust reposed in us by our constituents.

Mr. President, there is a psychological side to this question which must not be ignored. I know of nothing more disastrous in its consequences, more to be regretted, than for the people to lose faith in the honesty and veracity of their public servants. Now, what is the way out of the difficulty?

We are committed by treaty to the policy of settling differences of this character by diplomatic consideration, and I think we ought to exhaust every diplomatic resource, we should try every expedient within the range of diplomatic negotiations, before we consent to a settlement of the matter as has been suggested by the Chief Executive and proposed in the bill under consideration. We can not ignore the fact that there is intense and profound feeling on this question on the part of a large majority of the American people. Settlement of the matter by the passage of this bill would leave bitterness in the hearts of our people and create prejudice toward the English people, which once existed, but which the cordial relations existing between the two nations for nearly a century had well-nigh extinguished. Our first obligation is to the American people.

The party in power, as stated heretofore, must not overlook or disregard the binding force of its platform promises. We have condemned our opponents for violating party pledges. We distinctly stated in the Baltimore platform that every plank in our platform was made to be kept. The President significantly stated it was "not molasses to catch flies." I trust it will not be out of place for me to suggest that it becomes the duty of the President to see that the interests of the American people are not flies to be caught in somebody else's molasses.

I believe there is a vital principle in the maintenance of party organization. I believe the highest order of patriotism is involved in the observance of campaign promises. I know that no great question of political economy or governmental scheme was ever crystallized into law but that it had behind it a well-organized and properly disciplined political faction. I am sure that reform is impossible; I am convinced that the maintenance of our system of government is practicable only through the instrumentality of party organization.

The Democrats can not afford to be unfaithful. We can not afford to betray those who have trusted us. We must be true to every political obligation or the result will be disastrous to the party and more disastrous still to the country, because I believe that upon the success of the Democratic Party depends the future welfare of the Nation. It is the trusted, capable guard of the Ark of the Covenant of American institutions. I have introduced an amendment which I believe furnishes the remedy, and if adopted will lead us out of this wilderness of doubt and difficulty and land us safely in the Promised land of peace with the world, with all of our platform promises redeemed and our obligations to our country and duty to England absolved.

I ask to have that amendment be inserted in my remarks. I presume the Senate is familiar with its provisions, so I will not have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. VARDAMAN to the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912, viz: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof:

"That the second sentence in section 5 of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone,' approved August 24, 1912, which reads as follows: 'No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States,' shall be suspended and shall not take effect as a statute of the United States until July 1, 1915, on which date it shall have full force and effect as a statute law of the United States. It is further provided that the proper authorities operating said Panama Canal, who shall, prior to said date, collect tolls levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, are hereby directed to set apart all such tolls so collected and retain the same in a separate fund until July 1, 1915. On that date, or as soon thereafter as possible, such tolls so collected shall be returned to the parties from whom they were collected, provided no contrary disposition has been made by law prior to that time.

"That so soon as practicable after the passage of this act the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission, consisting of not less than three nor more than five persons to be selected by him, for the purpose of meeting a like commission to be appointed by His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British dominions beyond the seas, in a diplomatic conference, to be held at such time and place as His Britannic Majesty and the President of the United States may agree upon. The purpose of such diplomatic conference shall be to take into consideration the controversy now pending between Great Britain and the United States as to the proper construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, so far as the provisions of the same involve the right of the latter to regulate by its own legislation the levying of tolls upon vessels engaged in its coastwise trade and passing through said Panama Canal. It shall be the duty of such diplomatic conference, acting in the light of the discussions that have already taken place, to seek, in an equitable and friendly spirit, some practical solution of the entire question now at issue, which will worthily round out a hundred years of peace and friendship by respecting and conserving the interests and honor of both nations. The conclusions reached by such diplomatic conference shall be reported at its close to the Governments of Great Britain and the United States by their respective commissioners; but such conclusions shall not be binding upon either Government until accepted by both, and duly ratified upon the part of the United States by the necessary and appropriate legislation.

"That the expenses and compensation of the said commissioners to be appointed to attend said diplomatic conference upon the part of the United States shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Department of State according to law."

Mr. VARDAMAN. If my amendment shall be adopted, it will lift the controversy out of the domain of partisan politics, certainly for the present, and give us until July, 1915, to adjust matters. During that interval the people can be consulted upon the entire subject. We can ascertain whether or not the pledges given to them in the Baltimore platform and reaffirmed by the President on the hustings may be overthrown or approved, and in that way the gravest menace to the Democratic Party that has threatened it for many years can be averted by an appeal to the people themselves.

Now, what is the essence of my amendment? Let us analyze it and see just what it proposes to do.

It proposes a diplomatic conference between Great Britain and the United States. Its provisions are in perfect harmony with the cordial relationship existing between the two nations and in perfect accord with the terms of the treaty which we have entered into with Great Britain for the settlement of disputes of this character. It is happily appropriate in this centennial year of international peace.

What is a diplomatic conference? International law knows two kinds of assemblies of representatives of nations which meet in order to discuss and then dispose of pending controversies settled by treaties or less formal agreements. The assemblies to which I refer are congresses and conferences. Discussing the difference between a diplomatic congress and a diplomatic conference, Lord Beaconsfield said:

I really can not explain the difference between a congress and a conference, because I do not recognize any difference between them. There is a common idea that a congress consists of sovereigns, and a conference of plenipotentiaries; but there is no foundation for this distinction.

It may, however, be said that the term "diplomatic congress" may be applied to gatherings in which the governments' affairs are dissected and settled, while "diplomatic conference" is generally applied to gatherings in which less grave and more informal matters are discussed and disposed of.

The most important diplomatic conferences of recent years are as follows:

I quote here from the work of Dr. Hannis Taylor on International Law, and I ask permission to insert it in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The conference of St. Petersburg in 1825, which paved the way for the independence of Greece; the conference of London in 1831, which arranged the separation of the Kingdom of Belgium from Holland; the conference of Geneva in 1864, which gave direction to the first European effort to introduce greater humanity into the rules and practices of war; the conference of St. Petersburg in 1868, which resulted in a declaration prohibiting the use, on land or sea, of projectiles below a certain weight; the conference of London in 1871, which modified the treaty of Paris of 1856; the conference of Brussels of 1874, which met to discuss the laws of warfare on land; the conference of Constantinople in 1877, which vainly endeavored to obtain from the Porte guaranties for the better government of its Christian subjects; the west African conference of Berlin in 1884–85, which met to regulate the affairs of that region, including the boundaries and independence of the Kongo Free State; the marine conference of Washington in 1889, which is said to have been the first world conference ever held for purposes of quasi legislation; the conference of Brussels in 1890, which resulted in a final act for the suppression of the African slave trade; and the conference of peace at The Hague in 1899, which embodied the results of its labors in three treaties. * * *

Mr. VARDAMAN. A diplomatic conference must not be confused with a board of arbitration, because the primary purpose of the conference is to render arbitration unnecessary. The great hope which I entertain is that a body of prudent, peace-loving citizens of Great Britain and the United States may meet together now, and, after the whole subject has been thrashed out, they may find a way in which these subjects may be disposed of to the satisfaction of both Governments. If such a conference ever meets, its first effort will be to bring the negotiations back to the point it had reached in the summer of 1912, after the note of Mr. Innes, dated July 8, 1912, the British chargé d'affaires, who said that Great Britain would be satisfied if a guaranty could be given her that only bona fide coastwise trade of the United States should be exempted from the payment of tolls.

The Senate will recall the language employed by Mr. Knox in his letter of January 17, 1913. He said on this point:

No question has yet arisen within the rule of the existing arbitration treaty between the United States and Great Britain which may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, and until then any suggestion of arbitration may be well regarded as premature.

It was Mr. Knox's contention that the entire subject was still within the domain of diplomatic negotiation, and the proposition to submit the matter to arbitration was regarded by him as premature. Until such a negotiation has exhausted all of its resources, Great Britain has no right to request a call for arbitration.

Mr. President, I think I am well within the limits of conservative truth when I say that this question never would have been brought up, it would not now be threatening the overthrow of the Democratic Party, it would not now be disturbing the country, but for the speech made by the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] on January 21, 1913. It strikes me that the Democratic Party has fallen upon evil lines, its poverty of leadership has become pathetic when it has to rely upon the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], that astute, resourceful, untiring lawyer whose professional career is distinguished by his successful defense of predatory interests and "the malefactors of great wealth," this erudite, radical exponent of the Hamiltonian theory of government. For this man to become the defender of the Democratic faith, the leader and chief counsel of the Democratic administration, and the keeper of the conscience of the Democratic organization in the matter of the tolls controversy, I repeat, Mr. President, it is unfortunate, indeed, for the Democracy that this man, remarkable, distinguished, and great in certain lines as he is, should become the leader and be followed by the adherents of the party of Jefferson and of Jackson—that party which has held sacred the rights of the people, which stands for the preservation of the Constitution, the dignity of labor, the equality of Anglo-Saxon manhood, and the sanctity of the platform promise.

Lord, God of hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget.

Think of Bryan and ROOT pulling together shoulder to shoulder for the moral, mental, and material uplift of the American people and the preservation of our national honor!

Does any Senator imagine that the repudiation of platform promises will be overlooked and forgotten by the people because the distinguished Senator from New York tells us it is the right thing for us to do? Will his eloquence and logic be soothing and strong enough, oily and persuasive enough, convincing and overwhelming enough to justify our repudiation of our platform promise and convince our masters that in doing so we have done right? Will the cogency of the appeal of the distinguished Senator from New York so hypnotize the public mind that they will forget the excoriations which Secretary of State Bryan gave to the violators of platform promises in his remarkable address to the Pennsylvania Legislature on May 13, 1913?

An extract from that address is pertinent.

I want you to ruminate it—chew it mentally. I want you to teach it to your children until it becomes an instinct of the race. I want you to remember it, and—

> Forget it not till the crowns are crumbled
> And the swords of the kings are rent with rust;
> Forget it not till the hills lie humbled
> And the springs of the sea run dust.

Listen:

> The fact that we not only have platforms, but that the platform is becoming more specified year after year, is conclusive proof that the people believe in the Democratic theory, and they write their platforms because they believe, and those who run upon them lead the voters to believe, that they believe a platform is binding upon those who stand upon it.
> As a believer in the Democratic theory of representative government, I desire to announce it as a settled principle not to be questioned in this country, that a platform is binding upon every honest man who runs upon that platform. I have heard it said by men after an election that they could not conscientiously support something in their platform; and it raises a very important question whether a man should violate his conscience as a public servant, and I frankly tell you that I believe that no man should violate his conscience, either as an individual or as a public servant. Far be it from me to say that any man elected to office should as an official do a thing that his conscience condemns. But does that mean that he should violate his platform? No; it seems that his conscience should commence to work before the election and not hibernate until after the election.
> I lay it down as a proposition, and I am prepared to defend it anywhere, that the representative who secures office upon a platform and then holds the office and betrays the people who elected him is a criminal worse than the man who embezzles money intrusted to him.

Mr. Bryan has had something else to say about the duties of the President which it is not out of place to refer to here. In an article published in The Commoner on "The conception of the Presidency," July 18, 1908, he said:

> A President must have counselors—

I do not see how he could get along without them. If he had more counselors and advisers and fewer flatterers—O, Mr. President, I sometimes think it would be a godsend if we could print in golden letters upon the door of the White House the immortal words from Thomas à Kempis:

> Grant me prudence to avoid him that flattereth me,
> And to endure with patience him that contradicteth me.

Mr. Bryan said:

> A President must have counselors, and to make wise use of counselors he must be open to conviction. The President is committed by his platform to certain policies, and the platform is binding. * * * There ought to be cordial relations also between the President and those who occupy positions of influence in the coordinate branches of the Government, for our Government is not a one-man Government—

I expect he would take that back now. [Laughter.]

> But a government in which the chosen representatives of the people labor together to give expression to the will of the voters.

These are wise words and worthy of most careful consideration.

If a diplomatic conference shall be assembled, it can take into consideration, first, whether or not the plan of settlement contained in the note of Mr. Innes to Mr. Knox in the summer of 1912 can be worked and made practicable; second, it can take into consideration the plan of settlement suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who proposes to refer the matter to the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States; third, it can take into consideration the plan of settlement suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], whereby an adjustment may be made through a proportional contribution to the expenses of the canal by the foreign countries using it. They will not be limited to the consideration of any fixed number of rules, methods, schemes, or plans. The widest latitude should be given to the discussion of all the questions bearing upon the controversy. And if all these expedients fail the conferees or commissioners can consider the plan of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] for arbitration. If that fails, then the conference may find some plan of arbitration of its own acceptable to both parties.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that if this commission, chosen by the United States and Great Britain, shall come together in the spirit in which I am sure they will come together for the settlement of this dispute in such a way as to protect to its fullest extent the right of both parties to the controversy, and at the same time allay any feeling of bitterness that may follow an adjustment, I repeat, I have no doubt in the world about the success of their undertaking.

The people of the United States do not want anything except that which is justly and unquestionably their own. I am very sure that I voice the sentiment of nine-tenths of the American people when I say that in the settlement of this controversy they would have the President and the Congress so act as to win the cordial approval of the right-thinking world. They would not have us be otherwise than generous in dealing with our opponents.

We must fulfill to the fullest measure the terms of every promise that we have made directly or impliedly as a nation. Our constituents would not have us do less, and under the terms of the commissions which we hold as the representatives of the people, executing and performing a great trust, we can not do more.

Mr. President, I do not in any way share the feeling of hostility toward the English people or the British Government which some of my fellow countrymen have manifested in this discussion. I realize that the future development and the moral and material uplift of the world would be greatly promoted by that moral alliance between the two great branches of the English-speaking peoples which has been growing and strengthening for the last hundred years. We must not do anything ourselves or permit anything to be done by others which would in any way disturb the harmony and cordial cooperation of the two countries in working out and solving the great world problems. The most scrupulous regard for the rights and prerogatives of each other must be observed. For the mere appearance of trying to drive a hard bargain or take undue advantage by either nation to this controversy will necessarily minimize the impelling influence for good.

There should be no conflict between England and America. There should be no competition between the British subject and the American citizen, except that healthy spirit of rivalry which only serves to stimulate the patriotism, quicken the energies, and sharpen the intellect in the great world's service of solving the problems, industrial and otherwise, which confront the civilization of the century.

"There is a destiny that makes us brothers;" there is a superiority which distinguishes this great branch of the human family, which makes it the "heir of all the ages in the foremost files of times." Its brain, its prowess, its all-including qualifications are but the expressions of an Infinite purpose, the infallible proof that God has selected this race to lead the nations of the world to the highest point of excellency. Through this instrumentality I confidently hope for the realization of Tennyson's dream:

> When the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
> And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law.

If the pending bill, whose ultimate purpose is to acknowledge equal copartnership with Great Britain in the management and control of the Panama Canal, shall pass, I believe it will result in creating a bitterness of feeling in this country against Great Britain such as has not existed since the settlement of the Alabama claims.

Let those who imagine that they are friends of Great Britain pause and meditate before they take the final step. Where Great Britain has an ounce of common interest in the benefits to be derived from the pending repeal bill she has a pound of interest in preserving that great moral alliance which now unites the two great divisions of the English-speaking peoples.

I will venture to make two predictions, and I do not want to be regarded as a prophet of evil or as threatening the members of my own party. I am sure that those who differ from me are just as patriotic and as desirous of promoting the interests of the party as I am, but I think they are wrong in their judgment.

I believe, if this bill is driven through the Senate in its present form, the day the President signs it, if he does not sign the death warrant of the party it will be the warrant which will remove the party from power, I fear, for many years to come. As a consequence we will be swept from power in the House of Representatives at the November election, and then will end the power of the present administration to complete the program of reform to which we are pledged by the Baltimore convention, some parts of which we have so splendidly redeemed. Second, if this repeal bill is driven through the Senate, the day the President signs it he will sign the death warrant of that moral alliance which has so happily united the two divisions of the English-speaking peoples for many years. So soon as the American people realize that they have been deprived by the unfaithfulness of their own representatives of their right to control their own property in their own way, at the demand of a foreign power, they will turn in anger upon that power and renew a warfare which I hoped had ended forever.

Mr. President, it is a sad thing to think that misguided men should thus convert this centennial year, marking so long an epoch of peace, into the beginning of an era of unfortunate warfare, which can never end until the great wrong, now threatened, has been righted.

In this matter I stand firmly. First, as the advocate of my party, pleading with its members not to wreck its power in the hour of triumph; not to end the usefulness of an administration which has made such a brilliant beginning. The truest friends of the President are those of us who are striving to save him from a fatal mistake, which I fear will go far toward wrecking his political future. And his future welfare is so intimately linked with the future welfare of the whole country that you can not separate the two. His mistakes are the mistakes of the Nation, and whatever misfortunes may overtake him the Nation will suffer also.

I am not so much interested that certain men should hold certain offices, but I believe in the policies and principles underlying the Democratic Party. I believe its creed is the Ark of the Covenant of American institutions. I hold that fidelity to the policies and principles of the Democratic Party will give new life and vigor to the original principles and policies enunciated by the founders of the Government. As the head of the party, the President should be careful; he owes it to the country to move slowly.

In the second place, I stand here as a steadfast friend to the all-important moral alliance between the two great divisions of the English-speaking people upon which the future of civilization so largely depends. Why imperil anything so vital and important to us and the whole world without at least an effort to preserve it? Is such an effort not worth a trial? Is it not worth while for us to try the experiment of a diplomatic conference in the hope that some escape may be found without even the necessity for arbitration? If the effort fails, time for deliberation will be given, without the possible impairment of prestige, sacrifice of honor, or the loss of a single dollar.

Mr. President, I feel very deeply about this question. I feel that this moment, this occasion, is big with far-reaching consequences. I want to protect the rights of the American people. I believe the canal belongs to them; that there is no shadow upon their title to it and no limit upon their authority, so far as fixing tolls for ships flying the American flag is concerned. I want to respect the feelings and concede to England all of her rights. I want to maintain that cordial relation with the executive branch of our own Government. The President of the United States has not within this body a more devoted well-wisher than I am; but, Mr. President, I shall follow no man or body of men who carry the red flag of party infidelity, who will sanction the violation of a solemn platform promise. If there shall be doubt as to the meaning of the treaty, the only safe course that I can pursue will be to resolve that doubt in favor of the expressed will of the voters of this Republic. In the absence of instructions from the people I shall follow the torch of my own reason, stimulated, encouraged, and sustained by the one consuming desire of my soul, and that is to serve my country and my countrymen as they deserve.

To paraphrase the language of another, I am going to be true to myself and to my promise. I am going to let all my ends and aims be my country's good, and if I shall err it will be an error committed in the service of what I believe to be the truth.

Mr. President, in the final arrangement of things the sovereignty of the United States over the Panama Canal may be surrendered, the fruits of the enormous sacrifice of blood and treasure made by our people may be yielded up as the price we shall pay for sympathy and help in our international complications, and the canal dedicated to the unselfish service of the world, to be maintained and defended by the United States Government and the men and their children who gave their money and their lives to build it. But it shall not be done with my consent until I shall know the reasons why and be directed by my masters, the people, to make the servile surrender.

> The paths of Truth in every age have led men to > Gethsemane—to mocking and a cross.
> Its sacred light hath rent the veil behind
> Which error long has been concealed; and, though
> The priests of wrong have raged and sought to bind
> With thongs the souls of men, right on the tides

> The Cross can stay the morning of its triumph.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I think there are some of us who will endeavor to bear up, if the prophecy of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] comes true, that coincidently with the passage of this bill the Democratic Party will pass out of power. But I did not intend to devote any time to felicitating the country upon that prophecy.

The Senator from Mississippi has made the statement that this question would not have arisen had it not been for a speech made by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in December, 1913, as he stated. I simply desire at this time to put into the RECORD a bill introduced by Mr. SIMS, a Democratic Representative from the State of Tennessee, on the 24th day of August, 1912, which was the same day that the Panama Canal tolls bill containing this exemption was approved. The bill provided—

> That so much of the act approved August 24, 1912, which reads as follows: "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

On March 9, 1914, the same Mr. SIMS introduced House bill 14385 in the House of Representatives, and it is that bill which was passed by the House and is now before the Senate.

So it seems that a distinguished Democrat in the House had something to do with the attempt to repeal the coastwise exemption.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon an interruption, during the discussion of the tariff bill in the House the exemption was denounced over and over again as a subsidy, and a majority of the Democrats in the House voted against it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Ninety-one Democrats in the House voted against the exemption of coastwise vessels.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was before there was either a Republican or a Democratic platform formed or a speech made by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And only 71 Democrats voted in favor of the exemption.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there has been a very interesting discussion of the tolls question to-day. Two able speeches have been made on opposite sides of the question, and my friend the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] finds vast consolation in the fact that he is following the majority of the Democratic Party in the House.

I was impressed this morning with the views expressed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I followed his argument with much interest, for the reason, among others, that he is supposed to speak in large measure in this matter at this time for his party, and for the further reason that he is recognized as the leader of his party in charge of this important bill.

I was particularly impressed with some of the more controlling points which he made in support of his present position. I could not repress within me the spirit of contrast, and memory insisted on getting busy with another debate and a former occasion. He referred to the fact that the ex-President, Mr. Taft, had given it as his legal opinion that we have the right under the treaty to exempt vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, but he found sufficient evidence in the views of the ex-President to warrant him in the belief that the ex-President entertained some doubts nevertheless as to that view. As I understood the argument, listening from across the Chamber, of the distinguished Senator it was to the effect that the ex-President should have resolved those doubts in favor of a charge of tolls that we might sustain and maintain national integrity and honor. I so understood the drift of his argument. In any event he made much of the discovery that the ex-President, an able lawyer, entertained a doubt.

It is very possible that the ex-President, in resolving that doubt in favor of the American Government, found some consolation in the fact that the distinguished Senator from North Carolina had with great earnestness and precision announced the same principle in the debate upon this question two years ago. Possibly he was actually following an illustrious precedent. I call attention, as prefacing my remarks, to that principle so earnestly and ably announced. It was that if there was a doubt as to whether we had the right, a reasonable and substantial doubt, that doubt should be resolved in favor of the American Government and American interests. That seems to me to be an entirely creditable position and an entirely honorable position and quite a natural position.

It is only of late months, Mr. President, that we have come to the conclusion that it is a part of national honor to resolve all doubts against our interests. That has never been a principle as between Governments heretofore. No Government in the world has ever adopted the theory or the principle, in dealing with another nation, that all doubts should be resolved against itself. No stronger advocate of the opposite principle has ever been known than the English Government itself.

Mr. President, such matters have always been presented from one standpoint by every nation; and that is, where there is a reasonable doubt, the doubt shall be resolved in favor of the nation which is making the particular contention for the retaining of a questioned right or interest. As was said by Mr. Olney in his famous address, so often referred to, there is one principle of international law too well established to admit of discussion, and that is that where sovereign rights are involved or vital interests such as these, unless the language is so plain and unmistakable that it can not be misread or misunderstood, the doubt is resolved in favor of the sovereignty of the Government and of the challenged Government retaining its rights and interests.

But not only have we the authority of international law writers and the authority of such men as the ex-President, Mr. Taft, and the ex-Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, but we have the explicit and direct statement of the distinguished Senator himself upon this question. It will be found, under the date of August 6, 1912, that the following colloquy took place between the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]:

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that in his mind there was but little doubt that the other maritime nations would pay the toll of their ships through the canal.

Mr. LODGE. Other foreign nations.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I mean—other foreign nations; and it would put American shipping on a great disadvantage if our vessels have to pay toll.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; unless we pay their tolls or let them go through free.

Mr. SIMMONS. In that condition of things, bringing about this discrimination against American shipping in favor of foreign shipping passing through the canal, if it were not for our treaty obligations the Senator would think that we ought to allow our vessels to go through free?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator's second proposition, as I understood him, was that the treaty is subject to more than one construction. Under one construction we would not have the right to relieve our vessels of tolls and under another construction we would have the right to relieve our vessels of tolls.

Mr. LODGE. That is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, the proper and legitimate legal construction is a matter of doubt.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Shall we solve that question of doubt in the interest of American commerce to relieve it of this discrimination or shall we solve it against American commerce and impose this discrimination?

Mr. LODGE. The doubt certainly ought to be solved in favor of American commerce, but the moment you solve that doubt in favor of American commerce you are obliged to go to The Hague, as is required under our treaties of arbitration.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the question.

Mr. LODGE. In other words, we can not solve the doubt. It has to be solved elsewhere.

Mr. SIMMONS. But if there is a doubt we have to solve it here against ourselves or we have to solve it for ourselves and take the chances of The Hague tribunal.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The question I ask is, Does the Senator hold that we should solve that doubt as to the proper construction of the treaty against American shipping interests, or should we solve that doubt in favor of American shipping interests?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think that I favor making a test case, because, as I said, there is a possibility of getting but one decision from a tribunal where the judges will be furnished from nations whose interest it is to pay tolls on their own ships and force us to collect tolls from ours. There is no use in going to a tribunal constructed in that way, but, unfortunately, we are supposed to go to it under another treaty for the promotion of peace and good feeling, and if we are forced to go there we shall find ourselves in the position of having to exact tolls from our own vessels, and there will also be the imputation that we have not acted in good faith. To that I do not care to expose the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator would solve the doubt about this matter against American shipping?

Mr. LODGE. No; I should not.

Mr. SIMMONS. How are you going to get to The Hague?

Mr. LODGE. I should simply do as other nations. I should take the tolls and pay them or remit them as they go through, taking the tolls of the vessels at one end and handing it back at the other end, or whatever way you choose. It is what every other nation on earth will do for its vessels except ours.

Mr. SIMMONS. That solves the doubt against us, I think.

Mr. LODGE. How? It would not cost the Government a cent any more than a free vessel, but of course I understand how profound the terror is that in some way the Government of this country may help what remains of American shipping. I have not been here all these years without learning that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator certainly does not understand me as desiring to do anything against American shipping. I want to solve it by letting these vessels go through free, and if that makes a case for The Hague tribunal I can not help it, so far as my vote is concerned.

Now, Mr. President, more of that material may be found in that very able presentation of the matter by the Senator two years ago, but it certainly established with his authority, backed up by the authority of the most distinguished writers upon this question, that if there is a doubt, not only then but now, that doubt should be resolved in favor of American interests and of the American Government.

Upon what theory was it essential to national honor and national integrity that the doubt was resolved in our favor two years ago and that that doubt to-day shall be resolved against us? I can imagine changes in economic conditions and in industrial conditions and the rising up of new economic principles which would justify a change of vote. I challenge no man's integrity and impeach no man's purpose by reason of his change of vote; but by what logic and upon what theory do we resolve a doubt in favor of the Government at one time and at another time against our Government?

No, Mr. President, the true rule was announced by the distinguished Senator two years ago. It is a rule which will be found embedded in common sense and in the common practice of the nations of the earth in international law and by all writers upon this subject. It is a rule reasonable, just, and honorable, founded in courage and not in cowardice. Where a valuable right or great interest of the nation is involved and the language is doubtful, the doubt is always resolved against the nation which seeks to take that right or that interest away from another nation. In this instance Great Britain is contending for a most valuable interest, a powerful advantage, upon what is at most doubtful language—language which has been construed in different ways by great writers and publicists many different times—and, as Mr. Olney says, that question alone ought to settle this proposition. Where the doubt arises, the doubt must be resolved in favor of the sovereignty of this Government. And certainly those who advocate repeal can not contend that the language is other than doubtful under this rule when the greatest minds of the age are arrayed on either side, and especially when some of the greatest minds of the age have been on both sides.

Another proposition which interested me, Mr. President, in the speech this afternoon of the Senator from North Carolina was that of the high moral impulse and purpose back of this repeal; that those who were advocating repeal were advocating it out of a sense of national honor, implying more or less disregard for national honor on the part of those who are opposed to repeal; that involved in this controversy is the question of national integrity.

Mr. President, I do not doubt that that sentiment actuates those who are advocating repeal to some extent. Some of them, perhaps, are entirely controlled by that proposition. Others see different propositions with reference to the domestic interests, and so forth; but I make no question of their good faith. But again I call attention to the fact that some of us who believe that there were selfish private interests back of this repeal have no more able advocate of that proposition than the Senator from North Carolina. Some of us who believe that this matter would have been permitted to die, to rest where it was, practically settled forever by diplomacy, had it not been for powerful private interests, have no more thorough presentation of that issue and of that proposition to console and encourage them than was presented by the Senator from North Carolina on a former occasion.

Mr. President, those conditions have not changed. Those interests are still active. They did not sleep; they did not rest; and whether the Senator is conscious of the fact or not, the picture which he drew two years ago has its application in conditions which prevail at this time.

In his speech on August 9, 1912, in discussing this particular question, the Senator said:

During the last quarter of a century the greatest problem connected with our industrial situation has been the question of preserving commercial competition, protecting the people from the monopolization of production, protecting the people from the monopolization of the distribution of the products of industry. That is the great problem with which we have struggled. It has grown, as the years have passed, more and more acute; and to-day, if I understand anything about the signs of the times, the most vital question before the American people, outside of the tariff—and the tariff naturally affiliates itself with this question—the most vital question outside of the tariff before the American people, and the one that is going to exercise the most potential and determining influence in the presidential contest in which we are now engaged, is the question, How are we to preserve the essential principle of competition in our business life?

There is the genesis of the Democratic platform at Baltimore. You were going before the electorate for the vote and for support. You were advising the people that the most vital question in American industrial life was the preservation of competition, and that you were struggling against the great transcontinental railway combine which was throttling competition, and you advised the American electorate that vital and indispensable to the settlement of that question was to open the canal free of tolls.

I take a vast amount of pride in the courageous statement just made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], which will live long as a declaration upon the floor of this body for its courage, its incisiveness, and its true and devoted loyalty to the first principles of democratic government. You may cast aside and taunt those who claim that we should obey party platforms in this hour, but when you get back to the American electorate they will ask you to explain, and your explanation will be, whatever your words may be, as was said by the Senator from Mississippi, that your conscience did not begin to work until after the election.

But the Senator from North Carolina says further:

Mr. President, when it was proposed to construct this canal connecting the two oceans I have no doubt the desire that we should bring the two oceans together for military purposes and for purposes of general use had much to do with it; but I think if the people had not believed that it would furnish a means by which they could escape from the grip and the oppression of the transcontinental railroads, the Isthmian Canal would never have been constructed.

Have the transcontinental railroads been destroyed? Are they out of business? Is the incentive which moves to gain and to destroy competition any less than it was two years ago? Has the economic or the industrial situation changed? If not, what can we say as to our anxious solicitude for the people that they be protected prior to the great election and our contentment that they may shift for themselves thereafter?

Who was here opposing that canal? Who for more than a score of years delayed the beginning of this great work? Was it not the same railroads that are now saying they are anxious to utilize it as a means of transportation in the interest of the people? Why were they trying to defeat it then? Was it not because they knew it would interfere with their monopoly? Why are they seeking now to get control of it? Is it not because they want to continue their monopoly?

Oh, Mr. President, the idea of a subsidy; the idea of a monopoly for coastwise shipping; a monopoly in which every single individual under the American flag may engage and have an interest; a monopoly in which every citizen may invest his money, into which he may go as a business, was not the monopoly which you presented to the electorate of this country in 1912. The monopoly and the subsidy which you said would be granted to that monopoly was the monopoly of the transcontinental railroads, combined and controlled by interlocking directorates and in absolute control of the transportation interests from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It was to revive and keep alive competition between these two powerful transportation interests that you advocated with zeal and effect free tolls two years ago—what has changed the economic situation since then?

It was to get from under the grip of that combine which some of the great journalists of the country now say is mere demagogy to call to the attention of the people; it was to get from under the control of that powerful interest that we went as a party—and the Democratic and the third party went—before the people and pledged them that this canal, which had been built at the expense of the American Treasury, should be dedicated to free competition.

Vast and uncontrollable and immeasureable must be the influence of the powers and other nations of the earth to cause not only Presidents and Cabinets and Representatives and Congress, but the whole American people, to change their position on the preservation of competition so essential to our future industrial triumphs and the common welfare of all our people.

We have built that canal at a cost of $400,000,000, a sum that staggers the imagination—the greatest engineering feat of all the ages. It is the property of the people. The question is, Shall we so safeguard and protect that property as to make it an instrument in the accomplishment of the will and purpose of the people in its construction or shall we, by indifference and carelessness, fail to do that and permit the men who fought it, the men who for so many years delayed it, to get control of it and measurably defeat one of the main purposes of its construction? Shall we do that? I hope not.

If we want to secure to the people the full measure of benefit which they have a right to expect from the construction of this great enterprise, there are two ways in which we can do it. One is to make it a free canal for American ships. The other is to exclude from it all vessels owned by competing rail lines.

It was a simple proposition, it was accomplished, it was written into the law, it was practically settled. The American people had passed upon it. Every political party had indorsed it. It was said to the American electorate that we have done a vast thing; we have driven monopoly from the canal; the railroads shall not enter with their ships; and then we have dedicated that canal to free ships. We have kept out the monopoly and we have injected a new period and a lease of life in competition. These two great interests must bid against one another for the carrying of your grain, your live stock, and your merchandise.

The railroads are behind this demand for tolls. They favor tolls, whether they are allowed to use the canal or not. The higher these tolls are made the better the railroads will like it.

Suppose you impose a toll of $2 a ton on American commerce passing through the canal. What would be the effect? Would not the transcontinental railroads make the people pay the same amount of tolls in the shape of increased rates upon every pound of freight that they haul across the continent on their rail lines? The amount of domestic tonnage through the canal will be small compared with the transcontinental tonnage, and in that proportion the tolls in the form of high rates paid these railroads will exceed those paid through the canal.

Take these tolls by the water route off, and the rail routes, unless they own the water route also, will have to that extent to come down on the rail rates. With tolls retained, and railroad-owned vessels allowed, the Treasury of the United States would take in a few dollars, but the people would have to pay on the great commerce that crosses the continent five times as much in higher rates to the railroads.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Who is saying that?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

The Government would save a few dollars and the people who make up the Government and supply it with all its funds would lose many dollars.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator from whom he has just been reading. I do not know.

Mr. BORAH. I am quoting from the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

I think, Mr. President, as was said by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], that this is no ordinary and passing question. I am not so old that I expect to pass away before there is an opportunity for its fulfillment, so I am going to take the hazard of making a prophecy—I see my friend the Senator from Georgia shakes his head, and he doubtless remembers the statement that it is always dangerous for a public man to prophesy—that this vote here in this Congress on the repeal of this law will not settle the question. You will have to meet it before the great American electorate; you will have to meet it upon the stump; you will have to meet it before those to whom you made your pledge. It will never be settled until it is settled right and in favor of the clear rights of the American people. It will not be settled until that tribunal from whose judgment there is no appeal passes upon it; it will not be forgotten in 60 days, but on the 4th of November next it will be as fresh as it is to-day. Why? First, my friends, for the reason that whether you are right or wrong, whether you are correct in your position or not, your solemn pledge and your able speeches have all been to the contrary, and the American people will not be satisfied until this question is re-presented to them. When it is re-presented who will answer the able speech of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]? Where is the man upon that or this side of the Chamber who will confute his irrefutable argument made two years ago? Does anybody doubt that the transcontinental railroads fought the construction of the Panama Canal for 25 years; that they opposed its building, and that they were interested in the question of tolls? Did not their representatives appear here day after day? Can anyone confute the able argument of the Senator from North Carolina, or will anyone confute his other equally important statement, that where there is a doubt as to a probable right, and that doubt under that treaty right involves a matter of grave concern to the Government, every nation will decide the doubts in favor of its own interests.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator say that the representatives of these railroads appeared here from day to day demanding that freedom from tolls be repealed or that the free passage of vessels be not allowed, or was the Senator referring to their resistance years ago to the construction of the Panama Canal itself?

Mr. BORAH. I was referring to both.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator to state the names of their representatives who appeared here in connection with this tolls proposition. I never heard of any of them.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I could, if I desired to do so, give the names of the parties to the Senator; but that they were here neither the Senator from North Carolina nor myself can doubt, and he has stated, when it was fresh in his mind, that they were here. I conversed with them. The records and hearings show their position. They have made no concealment. Did not the New Haven investigation show money expended in and about the tolls bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when the Senator from Idaho has concluded, I shall make some observations; but when the Senator makes the statement that I had said that those representatives were here, he is referring to my statement made two years ago——

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. And not to my statement made as to their appearance before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals this year.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not contend that the representatives of the railroads have been here this time. There was no necessity for them to come this time. The matter was being cared for through the foreign office of Great Britain.

There is, however, no doubt there is no Senator who was here at that time who does not know that the railroads opposed this proposition. They have been opposed to it from the beginning, and they are opposed to it now. The situation has not changed. I do not quite understand the argument presented by the Senator from North Carolina, which ignores the conditions that he pointed out so plainly two years ago. No one in this body respects his ability more than do I, but I have found no one who undertakes to answer those particular propositions, and the Senator from North Carolina did not seek to do so this morning.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] began his remarks by a reference to statements made by me in my observations submitted to the Senate this morning in respect to the attitude of ex-President Taft. The Senator entirely misconstrued what I said with reference to ex-President Taft; and putting up his misconstruction as a man of straw, he proceeded to knock him down.

In speaking of acts of ex-President Taft contemporaneous with his approval of the canal act, I referred, first, to the fact that he accompanied his approval of the act of 1912 with the suggestion that the controversy between the two Governments be submitted to arbitration, and, secondly, to the fact that in fixing by Executive proclamation the basis upon which tolls were to be paid, which was upon the basis and assumption that the coastwise trade was also to be taken as having paid tolls as indicating that President Taft had grave doubt as to our right under the treaty to pass the act of 1912. I also referred to President Taft's subsequent declaration, namely, his speech in New York in 1913, in which he declared his willingness and his eagerness, if the matter came to a point during his administration, to submit the question to arbitration. I also referred to his Ottawa speech, in which he said that exemption upon the basis of tolls payment fixed in his proclamation was tantamount to the payment of the tolls upon our coastwise vessels by the Government; and I contended that those two contemporaneous acts of the ex-President, taken together with these subsequent declarations, indicated the state of his mind with reference to the question of our right under the treaty with respect to exemption of our vessels from tolls.

I did not say that President Taft had taken the position that in construing the treaty we ought to resolve all doubts in favor of this country. On the contrary, President Taft took the position that we were complying with the treaty, because, under his Executive order and proclamation, we were actually, through Government subsidy, paying tolls upon our coastwise vessels. So, so far as the Senator's argument, based upon the theory that I had represented President Taft as contending that all doubts should be resolved in favor of the United States, the Senator from Idaho was simply putting up a man of straw and knocking him down.

Mr. President, I did say two years ago, and I have said probably many times in my life, because it is a well-established principle of legal construction and of human action, if there is a doubt about your right to do an act which you regard as being in your interest, you have a right to resolve that doubt in your own behalf. That is not only a rule of construction but it is a rule of human action. And, Mr. President, when the canal act was passed, not only myself but a great many other Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, who have since changed their position on the tolls question, entertained very grave doubt about what were our rights with respect to this question under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and we did feel we might resolve those doubts in behalf of the United States.

I want to say that in 1912 the committee gave comparatively little consideration to this question, and though I was a member of the committee then, as I am now, I was not present at any time during those hearings, except during the statements of two members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, because I was engaged with another matter a part of the time and was ill another part. There were extended hearings on the bill before committee, but the testimony was directed to railroad-owned ships and divorcing railroads from water transportation. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], in his speech, stated a few days ago—and stated correctly—that when this question came up to a vote in committee he and I refused to vote upon it, because, as we then stated, we had not made sufficient investigation to satisfy our minds in the matter. I did entertain doubts about what was the proper course of action at that time. When that matter came before the conference committee, of which I was a member, I was still in a state of doubt about tolls exemption, but that was not the only question before the conference; there was another matter connected with this question before the conference committee, in which I was deeply interested, and about which I had no doubt. That matter was the question of separating railroads from water transportation. For years since I have been in the Senate I have tried to promote legislation to accomplish this result. That was my chief concern in connection with the action of that committee and the legislation involved. The other matter was a matter which I had not thoroughly investigated, and upon which I had no maturely formed opinion, as many other Members of Congress, who then voted for the bill and conference report and have since changed their position upon the matter, had not thoroughly investigated it.

Since that time, Mr. President, a flood of light has been shed upon this question, both with respect to the treaty and the economic aspects of it; since that time the American people have been studying it; since that time the Members of the Senate and the Members of the House, as is shown by the debates which have taken place upon this question both in the House and the Senate, as compared with the debates which took place two years ago, have been carefully studying the question.

This time we have had the most thorough investigation before the Interoceanic Canals Committee. It extended over nearly three weeks, sitting from 10 o'clock a. m. to 5 or 6 o'clock p. m. The Senator and myself are both members of that committee. I attended the hearings of the committee for nearly three weeks; I was present practically the whole time, and, in the light of the testimony that was presented to that committee, in the light of earnest personal study and the investigation I have made of this question, there is no longer in my mind a question of doubt; but to my mind it is clear that the United States has not the right to exempt its coastwise trade from the payment of tolls while exacting tolls from the vessels of other nations.

The Senator says that two years ago I discussed the question of railroad connection with this matter. Two years ago the railroads were here, as the Senator has stated, in full force. They were here chiefly, however, Mr. President, in connection with the proposition to exclude railroad-owned ships from passage through the canal and in connection with the proposition to divorce railroads from water carriers. They did incidentally, however, discuss the question of tolls, and I think the Senator was right in saying that they were opposed to the exemption of coastwise vessels from tolls, although I do not now recall the testimony of any railroad witness with respect to that question.

It is true, as the Senator says, and as I said two years ago, that the railroads have always opposed the construction of an isthmian canal, and for many years they delayed and defeated its construction. The railroads, now that it is constructed and about to be opened, regard it as a great menace to their prosperity and interests. Mr. President, it was natural that the railroads should oppose the construction of the Panama Canal. Tolls or no tolls, it is perfectly apparent to any man that the construction of the canal is going to cut enormously into the business of the railroads, but the effect of the payment of tolls upon that competition, in the light of the testimony in the hearings, will be negligible.

It did not appear to me two years ago that it would be negligble; it appeared to me two years ago that the question of tolls or no tolls might be an important factor in that competition. But, Mr. President, not only the testimony of those who appeared before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals for repeal, but the testimony of those who appeared before that committee against repeal, is replete with unanswerable evidence that the question of tolls will cut but small figure in the matter of transcontinental railroad rates and competition; that the difference between water rates by the canal and the rail rates across the continent when the canal is opened will be so tremendous that railroad competition, tolls or no tolls, will be absolutely impossible, and one of the chief witnesses against repeal before the committee was Mr. Dunn, who gave voluminous testimony containing facts and figures. The deduction from his whole testimony was that the opening of the canal, whether tolls were imposed or were not imposed, would result inevitably in diverting two-thirds—that is, two millions of their three millions of through traffic—of the transcontinental traffic now carried by the railroads to the water carriers, and that that would follow from the fact that the rate by water would be so far below that at which it was possible for the railroads to carry the freight, so infinitely below the actual cost of railroad transportation, that the railroads would simply have to go out of that business and surrender it to the ships.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire of the Senator if Mr. Dunn did not testify that he was connected with certain interests which, if tolls were not imposed, would make very large investments on the Pacific coast in the vicinity of San Francisco, amounting to something more than $50,000,000, in developing latent resources in that part of the country for the purpose of shipping the products of those resources to the eastern part of the United States, and that if tolls were imposed that investment would not be made, because the requirement of tolls would prohibit the traffic?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not remember the exact statement made by Mr. Dunn with reference to the concrete proposition suggested by the Senator from Kansas, but I do recall that he stated with reference to lumber that, after the canal was opened, lumber could be carried through the canal from the Pacific coast—from Oregon, Washington, and San Francisco—to New York, using petroleum instead of coal for fuel, for $4 a ton, and that it would be absolutely impossible for the railroads to meet that rate. I remember, also, that he said that other large, bulky, and heavy articles, which would naturally seek transportation by water, would be carried by boat at a like rate, and that it would be impossible for the railroads to meet that competition. He did say, also, that, as a result of the fact that the railroads could not meet this competition, they would only retain a fraction of their transcontinental business, and that that would be made up of such character of merchandise as boats do not ordinarily carry. For that reason, he made it clear that the exemption from tolls would not operate to affect water transportation in the lines of traffic which would naturally seek water transportation, because the rates by water would be so far below—one, two, or more times less than transcontinental rates by rail—that the small amount of 60 cents or a dollar a ton, measured by weight, on the average imposed on traffic through the canal in case coastwise ships were not exempted would not affect water competition by the canal at all.

When the railroads lose to the steamboats the major part of their through traffic, of course the question arises, Will they be permitted to recoup their losses? That is a question for the Interstate Commerce Commission. That they would have an opportunity to recoup their losses is, if so permitted by that commission, beyond all dispute, because if boats carry these products, they will carry them from a coast city to a coast city, and only a small part of the merchandise so carried will be consumed in these coast cities, so that the greater part of it will have to be retransported to the interior by rail. Five hundred miles is about the average back-haul zone, and when you get beyond that back-haul zone, Mr. President, that 500 miles stretching around the coast of our country, you are confronted with a zone vastly larger, a zone stretching 2,000 miles across the continent and 1,500 miles up and down the continent, to which the coast products must be carried by rail. The question is, If the result of this loss of business by the railroads because of their inability to compete with the water carriers shall reduce the revenues of the railroads, will the railroads be permitted to recoup themselves by increased rates to the interior? Should that become necessary, that may continue as giving concerns upon the basis of reasonable profits. And that, as I have stated, is a question for the Interstate Commerce Commission to deal with.

Mr. President, in the last investigation every angle of this question was considered. That had never been done before. The investigation was as thorough and complete as it could be made. Two years ago representatives of the railroads came here, as did representatives of the shipping interests. The railroad people were then opposing, as I have said, not primarily but incidentally, the exemption of coastwise ships from the payment of tolls. This year when we had our investigations I undertake to say that neither the Senator from Idaho nor the Senator from Kansas can mention the name of a single man interested in railroads, directly or indirectly, so far as the testimony before the committee showed, who came before the committee and asked the privilege of making a statement.

Why, Mr. President, did they come two years ago and oppose tolls exemptions, and why did they fail to come this year and ask for tolls? I take it, Mr. President, it was because of the fact that the railroads in the meantime had reached the conclusion which I, and I think other members of the committee, have reached, that the difference between the cost of transportation by vessels through the canal would be so great that railroad competition in any of the subjects of traffic which ordinarily would seek transportation by water was impossible.

Mr. President, I am not troubled because of the fact that I made a speech two years ago in support of exemption from tolls for coastwise vessels, as many other Senators did who have since changed their opinion and as many Representatives did who have changed their opinion. I am not disturbed by that fact. I change my opinion whenever conditions and situations are such as to make that change reasonable and proper. I change my position upon any question whenever a more thorough investigation and study of the subject changes my real opinion about the question.

If the Senator from Idaho has any trouble in his mind about my attitude in this matter, I have made my speech to-day; I have discussed the very questions that I discussed two years ago; I have discussed them with additional light—I had little light then, I have a flood of light now—and I am perfectly willing that the speech I have made to-day upon each of these questions to which he has referred in my speech two years ago shall be taken as my answer to that speech.

Mr. CUMMINS obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for just a few moments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to say only a word. I do not wish to leave with the Senate the impression that my mind is at all troubled about the attitude of the Senator from North Carolina, nor that the Senator from North Carolina has fallen in my esteem by reason of the fact that he has changed his position. Neither did I rise for the purpose of discussing that particular feature of the situation. I rose for the purpose of calling to the attention of the country a most able presentation of this matter as we now view it by the Senator from North Carolina, which neither the Senator from North Carolina nor anyone else has undertaken to answer. The Senator's speech to-day does not answer his speech of two years ago. It does not cover the subjects that the Senator from North Carolina covered two years ago. I listened to the speech with a great deal of interest.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not read every portion of my speech, as was stated at the time. If the Senator will permit me, I will now read the part of the speech which I omitted to read, which covers the very matter to which the Senator refers.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course I could speak only of the part of the Senator's speech which I heard. I do not challenge the word of the Senator. If it is in his speech and will be printed to-morrow, I will read it; and if I conceive that his former speech has been properly answered, I shall be glad indeed to read it and reread it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I commend it to the Senator from Idaho, and I hope he may read it. In the interest of saving time I did not read it. It embraces a number of pages, however, and I passed it over, stating at the time I did so that I was both weary and somewhat indisposed, and had taken up more time than I intended to take, and I supposed the Senate would not object to my inserting it without reading. I will read it now, however, if the Senator would like to hear it.

Mr. BORAH. No; I think I shall not take up the time of the Senator to have him read it now. I assure the Senator that I shall read his speech. I either listen to his speeches or read them at all times.

Mr. President, the Senator has suggested in his reply some things which apply not to the Senator personally but generally to this discussion that I am going to ask the indulgence of the Senator from Iowa for a few moments while I make a suggestion or two. I refer to this "flood of light" which has come in these later days; this revelation, as it were. It has had its effect in some quarters. It has not reached other quarters. The prayer of sincere men is that it will permeate all parts of the earth, and after a while we all shall be able to judge of our position with the aid of that "flood of light."

What is this "flood of light," Mr. President? First, let us take the treaty. We had the treaty two years ago, and had had it since 1901. It is the same old treaty now. The language is precisely the same. The "flood of light," Mr. President, of which the Senator speaks, is not a thing which it is legitimate for the Senate to consider at all.

What has a letter of an agent of a government to do with the language of a treaty which we are called upon to ratify and which we are called upon to construe? Mr. President, you could not go into court and introduce this kind of evidence, which they say here should control, instead of the language of the treaty itself, to modify the most ordinary contract.

We did not ratify Mr. Hay's interview with some newspaper man. We did not ratify Mr. Choate's letter nor his view of the treaty. We ratified the treaty. It was our treaty. We made it. Mr. Choate's letter or Mr. Hay's interview with this enterprising newspaper man were not before the Senate. The treaty-making power made this treaty just as it reads, and by its language we stand and within its four corners we must find all rights and all obligations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator seriously contend that in the construction of a treaty we can not consider and ought not to consider the diplomatic correspondence which preceded the making of that treaty? Does the Senator seriously contend that that is not competent to aid in the correct interpretation of the treaty?

Mr. BORAH. What is the date of this interview with the newspaper man?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not speaking about the interview with the newspaper man.

Mr. BORAH. But that is one of the things to which the Senator referred.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator said——

Mr. BORAH. I will get to that in a moment. What is the date of it and what possible thing has the interview of Mr. Hay with the newspaper man to do with this treaty?

Mr SIMMONS. The Senator knows perfectly well that I offered that statement of Mr. Hay to Mr. Fletcher Johnson for the purpose of meeting the argument that had been made to the effect that Mr. Hay thought the term "all nations" excluded the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Let me put a question to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a different proposition altogether. It is purely and simply in answer to a contention here as to what Mr. Hay thought about this matter—not expressed in the diplomatic correspondence, not contemporaneous with the execution of the treaty, but subsequent to the treaty. I understood the Senator to be asserting the proposition that the contemporary correspondence between Mr. Hay and Mr. Choate, our ambassador who participated in the negotiation of this treaty on behalf of this country, and between Mr. Choate and Mr. Hay and Lord Lansdowne and Lord Pauncefote, who participated in its negotiation on the part of Great Britain, was not competent in any court as affording any light which the Senate would care to receive and have in reaching a just and correct interpretation as to the meaning of the treaty. Do I understand the Senator as taking that view?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I take that position. I claim that we are bound by the language of the treaty, and that some man's view of what he thought it meant is not and should not be in any sense controlling.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator. I think it is the custom of nations to preserve carefully, as a memorial, all the diplomatic correspondence leading up to these international agreements, and to preserve it so that in case a dispute should afterwards arise as to the meaning of a treaty it may be there for the purpose of throwing light upon the meaning of the treaty and its proper interpretation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if there is such custom prevailing among the nations of the earth, I am unfamiliar with it. On the other hand, the very opposite, in my judgment, is true. When we fell back upon letters and negotiations in regard to treaty interpretations England notified us more than once that it was hardly necessary to remind our Government that a treaty was to be construed according to the language found in the treaty and not according to letters passing between the parties who negotiated the treaty. True, she has taken an opposite position, but never conceded it when against her, and I do not know of any nation that ever did.

Mr. President, that treaty was negotiated by those agents, and it was sent here to the Senate. Certain amendments were suggested, and they were finally adopted, and it was signed by these parties. That treaty was made here. Those vital and important amendments were suggested here. These agents were selected simply for the purpose of exchanging and signing the treaty, as it were; but the language which we have to construe and the language which binds us, and which alone binds us, is found in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. This "flood of light" with reference to the interpretation of the treaty is the kind of evidence which would not be admitted in a court of justice to change the terms of a contract of any kind. But upon this outside evidence and outside views, not before the Senate or considered by it, we are now asked to yield up most vital and substantial interests of our Government and our people.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, Mr. President, conceding, for the sake of the argument, the legal proposition of the Senator that of course in the last analysis the treaty must speak for itself, does the Senator contend that where the language of the treaty is obscure, ambiguous, or uncertain we can not look to the diplomatic negotiations in its making, with a view to resolving that doubtful and ambiguous meaning?

Mr. BORAH. I do contend that we can not do so. When the language is ambiguous, then there is occasion to open up diplomatic relations to adjust our differences; but where it is on a plain question of yielding rights, it should never be done on letters or views outside the treaty.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator and myself can not agree upon a legal proposition.

Mr. BORAH. How would the view, for instance, of Lord Pauncefote in any sense express the view of the treaty-making power of Great Britain; and how could it be said that the individual view of Mr. Hay was the view of the 96 or 90 Senators who assembled here and passed upon the treaty? The Supreme Court itself has passed upon that question, so far as concerns going back into the debates of Congress to determine the meaning of a statute, and has settled the proposition. While the language of Mr. Hay may give some consolation to those who desire to take that view, if there was any tribunal controlled by the rules of legal evidence which was to pass upon this proposition I venture to say that his language would not be accepted by that tribunal to determine the meaning of the final contract.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention now to another matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not contend that it would be accepted in a court of justice, to use the illustration of the Senator a little while ago; but I have entirely misunderstood the principle of international law with reference to construing ambiguous phrases in a contract between nations if an international tribunal, authorized to construe and interpret it, has not the right; and it is not the habit under recognized international custom and procedure to look to things outside the treaty but which pertain to the negotiation of the treaty, especially the correspondence and notes between the representatives of the respective Governments in negotiating the treaty in dispute.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, suppose we take the rule the Senator has suggested, and undertake to follow it out to its legitimate and logical conclusion. Mr. Hay, we will say, has one view of what happened. The ex-President, Col. Roosevelt, has another view. David Jayne Hill has another view. It seems that this party and that party entertain different views as to what the language meant and what the treaty meant, what we were to do under the treaty, and what we had a right to do under the treaty. All these parties were interested in the negotiation. They represented the Government which was making the treaty. Having different views, would the Senator select the particular party who signed the treaty as being the sole custodian of the intent and purpose of the treaty; or would he associate with him the other parties who represented his Government, but who, under the mere forms of government, were not required to sign the treaty?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have stated to the Senator that it is my understanding that it is the custom of nations, in negotiating these treaties, to commit carefully to writing their negotiations. The fact is, in connection with this very treaty, when it was completed, that there is something in the correspondence which shows that the British ambassador asked that our ambassador or the Secretary of State, I do not recall which, should make a concrete statement of his understanding with reference to the meaning and intent of the treaty; and I take it that the British Government has in its files a like statement. These negotiations reduced to writing, these final statements of the negotiators filed with the State Departments of their respective Governments, are filed there for the purpose of remaining as a memorial of the facts and circumstances connected with the negotiation of the treaty, for the purpose of their use in case any future controversy should arise as to the meaning of any doubtful clause in the treaty.

If that was not so, why were we passing resolutions here in the Senate, when this matter was under consideration before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, requiring the State Department to transmit to the Senate, for the use of this committee in the hearings before it and for the use of the Senate, all of this correspondence and all of these negotiations and every fact connected with them that was reduced to writing and on file in the department, in order that we might have them for the purpose of enabling us the better to determine the meaning of these doubtful phrases?

Mr. BORAH. As I said a moment ago, there is doubtless a vast amount of balm and consolation for one who is seeking a certain interpretation in finding some one who has written a letter, or given a supposed interview, as to what he considered the meaning of the treaty. Let me, however, call the Senator's attention to a precedent which he will recollect. He is very familiar with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and, as I understand, he places much reliance upon that treaty as supporting his position.

When we executed the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, at the very time it was executed and exchanged, Mr. Bulwer handed to Mr. Clayton a note stating what he understood to be the meaning of the words "Central America," and that the words "Central America" did not include the Belize Islands or British Honduras. That note was passed to Mr. Clayton at the time the treaties were exchanged. Mr. Clayton made no reply to it immediately, but did so a few hours or days afterwards. That note, handed to Mr. Clayton, has been consistently repudiated by American diplomatists as having nothing to do with the language of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It was under that duplicitous and somewhat shrewd practice upon the part of Mr. Bulwer that England justified her violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty when she erected British Honduras into a colony in 1862; but Mr. Blaine and the American diplomatists never for a moment recognized the binding effect of Mr. Bulwer's note.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator certainly has not understood me to mean that we had to accept, as importing absolute verity, every statement made by the negotiators. I hope the Senator has understood me to mean that these notes and this correspondence should have no application except in case of a doubtful construction, and then they could be used only for the purpose of making clearer that uncertain construction.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator exactly, and I understand him now.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me to finish, however——

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say that with reference to these disputed questions concerning the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty I do not now recall that there is the slightest conflict between the American and the British negotiators at any point upon any question relating to the first clause of the third article.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think I misunderstood the Senator's contention with reference to the purpose for which the notes on the side could be used. It was to throw light upon the meaning in case there was doubt. That was precisely the situation with reference to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. When the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was executed, or when the exchange took place, you will remember that the words "Central America" were used in the inhibition against England or the United States obtaining further possessions or territory in Central America. England claimed that Central America at that time consisted of five States, and did not include British Honduras and the Belize Islands. When the treaty was executed, or when an exchange was had, England placed her construction upon that treaty by handing us a note as to the meaning of the words "Central America," but the United States never has recognized for a moment that contention.

Again, in the Welland Canal controversy, you will recall that the English Government notified the United States that it was hardly necessary to remind the United States that the terms of the treaty, whatever they were, controlled, and that, exterior or dehors, the record evidence could have nothing to do with it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if he does not think there is a substantial difference between the effect of a note written ex parte by Mr. Bulwer at the conclusion of the negotiations, giving his view of the meaning of the treaty, and answered by us, giving a different view of the treaty, and the cotemporaneous letters written pending the negotiations, as to the effect the two should have in helping us find out the real meaning of the treaty?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia is a very able lawyer——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. And he has had a vast amount of experience in the practice of law. I will ask him a question. Suppose he were in court to recover upon a contract, and that contract had been the result or brought about through correspondence, through letters exchanged by the parties, but finally, after the letters had been exchanged, they signed a contract, would not the Senator contend that the contract alone controlled and that the letters were merged in the contract, and that that and that alone was the thing upon which their minds met? Now, the treaty-making power of the United States and the treaty-making power of Great Britain made a treaty, and they did not ratify any individual's views. If the treaty-making power had one view and the mere scribes and signers another, I apprehend the former should control.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would, but I would make this qualification: If there was language in the contract the meaning of which was doubtful, and the letters between the parties clearly indicated not different views but concurring views as to what the language of the contract was to mean, those letters could be used to help determine an uncertain term in the contract.

The language of the contract, of course, would be conclusive; it would be the language of the contract which would control; but if the meaning of an expression in the contract was doubtful, letters passing between the parties prior to that time expressing their purpose as to what the contract was to mean and showing an agreement between them could be used to help determine the actual meaning of the contract, not, however, to vary it at all as it was finally made.

Mr. BORAH. Let me call the Senator's attention to what a dangerous precedent he would be establishing in matters of international law and the conclusion of treaties.

The Senator says that when the language of a treaty is doubtful he would go back to the letters for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of the treaty. Then you fall back not upon your treaty for your final rights, but you really rest your rights, be they important as they may, involving national sovereignty or anything else, upon the letters which led up to the treaty.

No such rule as that has ever been established, to my knowledge, among the nations of the earth. In the first place, it would lead to too much trickery and deception, as diplomacy is carried on. In the second place, it would be too dangerous a proposition, because the Senate of the United States, for instance, is the final arbiter and judge upon the treaty; and as it interprets the language and as it ratifies the treaty we are to be bound, and not by what some discharged agent—I say "discharged" because the negotiations had ended and the service was at an end—has said in regard to it. It is the view and the understanding of the treaty-making power as the treaty is finally ratified and passed upon by the treaty-making power. We will regret the day if we establish in this controversy the precedent that upon such language as is used in this treaty we are willing to go back to letters to determine what it means and what our rights are.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very much interested in the Senator's argument, as I am in all discussions upon the floor of the Senate. I think, however, that his reference to the note which accompanied the exchange or attempted exchange of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not entirely analogous to the situation here.

After the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been signed by the negotiators it was submitted to the Senate of the United States, where it was ratified by a vote of 42 to 11. That disposed of the treaty so far as the action of the Senate was concerned. It was then sent to Great Britain and was ratified by that Government. Notice was then given, under date of May 28, that the Queen's ratification would be prepared without delay. Afterwards, on June 8—and I am referring to the history of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by Mr. Travis—Lord Palmerston directed Bulwer to make the following declaration on the exchange of ratifications:

> Her Majesty's Government do not understand the engagements of the convention as applying to Her Majesty's settlement at Honduras or its dependencies.

So it would appear that after the Senate had ratified the treaty, and after the British Government had ratified the treaty, this note, which attempted to limit its application to the part of Central America which was exclusive of Honduras, was delivered by Lord Bulwer to Mr. Clayton. It therefore would seem to be a declaration subsequent to the ratification of the treaty, and could not affect the understanding of the meaning or terms of the treaty, either at the time it was prepared or at the time it was ratified.

In that instance Mr. Clayton first concluded to make no exchange whatever of the treaty. He afterwards concluded that he had better do so, but took care to limit his acceptance of the note of Lord Bulwer by replying that the treaty was not understood "to include the British settlement in Honduras, commonly called British Honduras, as distinguished from the State of Honduras, nor the small islands in the neighborhood of that settlement which might be known as its dependencies." As a matter of course this transaction which followed the negotiation and the ratification of the treaty could not under any circumstances be permitted to either limit or otherwise affect its application to the two contracting powers for the purposes which they sought to subserve by virtue of it. Indeed Mr. Clayton informed the British minister that no alteration in the treaty could be made without the assent of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator the exact date of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty?

Mr. THOMAS. I can perhaps find it for the Senator in a moment. I am not able to turn to it immediately; but ratification preceded the exchange of the notes to which the Senator refers.

Mr. BORAH. The ratification preceded?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. When did the ratification take place?

Mr. THOMAS. The ratification by the Senate?

Mr. BORAH. By the Senate and by the English authorities.

Mr. THOMAS. The English Government ratified the treaty prior to May 28, that being the date upon which notice was given that the Queen's ratification would be prepared without delay. The Senate ratified the treaty prior to that time and before it was sent to Great Britain for ratification.

Mr. BORAH. Before the final exchange took place and before the treaty was ratified by both the Governments these notes, I understand, were exchanged.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. BORAH. I feel very certain that I am not mistaken.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very sure if these notes had been exchanged prior to ratification the Senate of the United States would not have approved the treaty.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely what one of the Senators said, that if they had known of this interpretation—President Buchanan, I think it was, said it would not have been ratified.

Mr. THOMAS. One of the Senators so stated, and that was the general temper of the American public upon the subject.

Mr. BORAH. In order that we may have the benefit of this for what it is worth, let me recall now that on the 29th of June, 1850, Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, the British minister at Washington, handed to Mr. Clayton, the American minister, the following declaration, in writing:

> In proceeding to the exchange of ratifications of the convention signed at Washington on the 19th April, 1850, between Her Britannic Majesty and the United States of America relative to the establishment of a communication by ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans the undersigned, Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiary, has received Her Majesty's instructions to declare that Her Majesty does not understand the engagements of that convention to apply to Her Majesty's settlement at Honduras or to its dependencies. Her Majesty's ratifications of the said convention is exchanged under the explicit declaration above mentioned.

The exchange took place upon the part of Great Britain under the explicit declaration that it did not apply to British Honduras. This was the English Government speaking at the time that the exchange took place.

Mr. THOMAS. But after the ratification of the treaty by both Governments.

Mr. BORAH. That might be true, but nevertheless at the time the contract is delivered by one of the parties the exchange takes place. You have this interpretation or construction put upon it.

I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if he thinks that kind of evidence could carry with it less verity than a letter written by a minister of the United States after the exchange had taken place or by an interview a newspaper man is supposed to have had with Mr. Hay several months after?

Mr. THOMAS. No, I do not; but I do believe it carries less verity and importance than the statements which were made by those who negotiated the treaty as to what the understanding of the treaty was between the parties during negotiation and at the time of ratification.

In making this statement I am not asserting the proposition that the treaty, if otherwise framed, can be affected by the understanding between the parties at the time of its acceptance, but I do think there is a very material difference between a declaration of one of the signatory powers to a treaty as to its interpretation of that treaty made at the time of the exchange and subsequent to ratification, and statements which embody the understanding between the parties and were made during the negotiations.

Mr. BORAH. There may be a difference in what you might call the strength of the evidence as a probative fact. This same author, in discussing this proposition, referring to the note which I have just read, said:

> The ratifications were not, as this action and document implies, exchanged at this time. Their exchange took place several days later.

Then we find here this note delivered——

Mr. THOMAS. The exchange took place July 4, 1850.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. We find several days before the exchange of treaties took place the note handed by one of the negotiators to one of the other negotiators, and we find in the statement this:

> Her Majesty's ratification of the said convention is exchanged under the explicit declaration above mentioned.

That Honduras was not included in Central America.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in just a moment. Mr. President, there we have certainly about as strong a piece of that kind of evidence as could be had. It is certainly infinitely more conclusive, if that kind of evidence is to be binding at all, than a vast mass of evidence which has been called into existence as to the declarations of Mr. Hay and the declarations of Mr. Choate, and of this party and that party afterwards. It only shows that when we wander off into that interminable wilderness of correspondence and negotiations outside of a treaty we are at sea in a ship without a compass.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to add, as bearing upon this branch of the discussion, that Mr. Bulwer consented to receive Mr. Clayton's counter declaration after considerable discussion. It was asserted by Reverdy Johnson, whose authority, of course, no one can dispute, and who conferred freely with both the negotiators, that it was distinctly understood by both Clayton and Bulwer that the declarations were of no validity in law and could not affect the treaty. I do not think there can be any question about that.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose so.

Mr. THOMAS. What does the Senator say?

Mr. BORAH. If I understand the statement of the Senator, I do not disagree with him.

Mr. THOMAS. In view of the fact that the declaration was made and these notes exchanged under circumstances verified by so high an authority as Reverdy Johnson, and in view of the additional fact that these notes were exchanged subsequent to the actual ratification of the treaty by the two Governments, but prior to the exchange of the treaty between the two officials, it certainly seems to me that it occupies a very different place from that line of testimony which goes to show the understanding of the signatory powers during the time of negotiation and acceptance of the proposed treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho a question, if he will yield for a moment. Have you the date of the answer to the Bulwer letter by Mr. Clayton?

Mr. BORAH. It was July 5, 1850.

Mr. THOMAS. The exchanges were made on the 4th of July.

Mr. BORAH. Here is the memorandum.

MEMORANDUM.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 5, 1850.

That is the memorandum which Mr. Clayton made.

> The within declaration of Sir H. L. Bulwer was received by me on the 29th day of June, 1850. In reply, I wrote to him my note of the 4th July, acknowledging that I understood British Honduras was not embraced in the treaty of the 19th April last.

So his letter would seem to be dated the 4th of July. The memorandum which was made was dated on the 5th of July.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was not Mr. Clayton's letter, dissenting from the view of Mr. Bulwer, delivered prior to the exchange of the treaties? I am not sure that I am accurate, but it has always been my impression that the two notes passed taking a different view of the treaty, and yet the treaties were exchanged.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. We have now a line of this kind of evidence. The parties who represented the two nations each placed a construction upon the treaty. I understand the logical position of the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from North Carolina is that this evidence dehors the record is not good unless all the parties to the negotiation agreed exactly as to what it meant; and it is not a question of the kind of evidence, but it is a question whether or not you find a condition of affairs in which all the parties agreed as to the meaning of the treaty.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have not said that, but I did say that in this particular case, with reference to this particular question, there was entire accord between the negotiators, as disclosed in the correspondence.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose they had not been in accord. Suppose Mr. Hay had taken one view and Mr. Pauncefote the other. What, then, would the Senator have done with this evidence outside the record?

Mr. SIMMONS. It would not be so valuable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would suggest to the Senator if they had taken entirely opposite views as to what the language should mean before the treaty was agreed on originally, the natural consequence would have been to have stopped and written another treaty, or else each would have been so certain of his own meaning that it would have been left entirely to the treaty to determine what it meant. But neither one of the two letters would have helped at all in the construction of the treaty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not understand that Mr. Bulwer and Mr. Clayton differed as to the construction of the treaty. I understood that they agreed, but that Mr. Clayton said that he would neither affirm nor deny the British claims; and while saying that, speaking for himself, he understood the treaty as Mr. Bulwer did. That is my recollection of the position.

Mr. BORAH. The fact is that Mr. Clayton simply refused to put a construction upon that note. He neither affirmed nor denied what Mr. Bulwer claimed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But he did say, speaking for himself, that he understood it in the same way. That is as I recall it.

Mr. BORAH. Here is another incident of that transaction.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has the Senator the Clayton letter?

Mr. BORAH. I have the Clayton letter, and I have another Clayton letter that I want to read. Mr. Clayton to Senator King, July 4, 1850, says:

> I am this morning writing to Sir H. L. Bulwer, and while about to decline entering the treaty at the time of exchanging ratifications, I wish to leave no room for a charge of duplicity against our Government, such as that we now pretend that Central America in the treaty includes British Honduras. I shall therefore say to him in effect that such construction was not in the contemplation of the negotiators or the Senate at the time of the confirmation.

Then Senator King writes to Mr. Clayton on the same day:

> The Senate perfectly understood that the treaty did not include British Honduras. Frankness becomes our Government, but you should be careful not to use any expression which would seem to recognize the right of England to any portion of Honduras.

Now, Mr. President, at the time this negotiation was going on and before the final exchange took place and before the final delivery was had this correspondence took place, and one of the Members of the Senate declared as to what the Senate understood, and yet no American diplomatist or Secretaries of State to whose attention this was called ever recognized that as the proper construction of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. They always contended that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by its language using the words "Central America" included British Honduras, and that as Stephen A. Douglas and President Buchanan and a number of them declared it was a plain violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, notwithstanding this exchange of notes, when they undertook to erect British Honduras into an English colony.

Here is an instructive lesson upon this question of going out and hunting up evidence outside of the record for the purpose of determining what the plain words of a treaty mean. It does not make any difference——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator mean that the Democratic representatives at that time agreed with Mr. Bulwer? They disagreed with him, did they not?

Mr. BORAH. Stephen A. Douglas disagreed with him. He belonged at that time to the men who were opposed to making the Clayton-Bulwer treaty at all. He thought it was conceding a right to the English Government which ought not to be conceded. He said it would give us a vast amount of trouble, and President Buchanan said it would in all probability involve this country in war with Great Britain. They were opposed to the treaty entirely, but nevertheless Mr. King, as I remember chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, writes this letter:

> The Senate perfectly understood that the treaty did not include British Honduras. Frankness becomes our Government, but you should be careful not to use any expression which would seem to recognize the right of England to any portion of Honduras.

That construction placed upon this treaty by Mr. King and that note of Mr. Bulwer were discarded entirely when the question arose afterwards as to whether or not Central America did include British Honduras, and the position which the United States took was contrary to the position which is stated here, that treaty did not include British Honduras. In other words, our statesmen and diplomats repudiated the interpretation which Mr. King put upon it. They rejected the interpretation which Mr. Bulwer put upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But did not Mr. King say that he should be careful to use no language which would include it?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly; but he says, "The Senate perfectly understood that the treaty did not include British Honduras," but he warned the Secretary of State not to furnish an affirmative evidence of title in Great Britain by admitting it.

In other words, the position was that they did not know to whom British Honduras belonged. It might be a separate independent Government down there. He simply warned him not to admit that England owned it, but he said at the same time that it was not included in this treaty. It might have been owned by Spain; it might have been an independent government. What he desired Mr. Clayton to do was not to admit the title of Great Britain; but afterwards, you remember, Great Britain contended that Central America did not include the British Honduras and we contended it did. Notwithstanding Mr. King had said, "The Senate understood at the time that it did not." Why? Because we relied upon the language of the treaty and rejected all these letters and exchange of notes and interpretations made at the time of the exchange. No, Mr. President; I repeat, as I said a while ago, this is a new doctrine, and it is the most dangerous doctrine that this country could possibly lay down with reference to the interpretation of treaties.

How shall we ever know when a treaty is ratified what our rights are if lying back in the undeveloped somewhere are letters and negotiations, and so forth, which may give it a meaning the treaty-making power did not entertain.

Does the Senate ever call before it the letters and the negotiators and put them upon the witness stand to find out what their understanding and intent were? Certainly not. We bring a treaty before us, pass upon its language, and ratify it, and doing so act upon the language which we find in the treaty; and it does not concern us at the time to know what interpretation somebody outside ourselves may put upon it.

That contention is a twin brother to the other proposition that we have lately invoked with reference to international affairs; and that is, that wherever there is a doubt we shall resolve it against ourselves; wherever we have an important right, give it up; let us have no controversy at all. If England should break away from her usual modesty and should claim something that really does not belong to her, if she should make a contention under the treaty which might be hard to sustain, let us have no controversy; let us give it up; it does not involve anything except our right over our domestic commerce; it involves a small affair like controlling our own territory; it only involves the control over a very vital strategic portion of our Government. These are small and inconsiderable and inconsequential affairs, and as England, in behalf of international brotherhood and the peace of mankind, is seeking to secure that advantage to herself and that disadvantage upon us, the new doctrine is, the new sense of national honor and national integrity is, yield our contention; it is dishonorable to stand up and argue for American rights, whether we be right or wrong—yield to the opposing Government.

Why, Mr. President, if that rule had been invoked when we made the treaty in 1783 with Great Britain, when Great Britain delayed giving up the Northwest Territory and the posts which she had established there, if the American Government had said, "Very well, you are our mother country; we will yield upon this point," a vast amount of that great territory, which is now the pride of the United States, might not now be ours.

We have been in a contention with that great Government from the hour of our birth over important treaty rights; and for the first time, in the morning of the twentieth century, we have announced the doctrine that when in her sense of right she demands a thing, we shall yield it.

Another thing, Mr. President, passing from that, the Senator from North Carolina was of the opinion that this matter was not very fully considered at the time that we had it up in 1912.

Mr. George C. Butte, a distinguished writer upon this subject, calls particular attention to that phase of the matter. He says:

> Seldom has any proposed legislation been the subject of such a thorough and general discussion in the Congress of the United States as this—

That is, the act of 1912.

> Aside from the reams in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the debates upon various aspects of the proposed canal act, above all with reference to the tolls questions, several volumes covering hearings before congressional committees, reports of military, scientific, legal, and commercial experts, etc., were ordered printed and distributed among the Members. The hearings before the House committee alone cover 1,127 pages, and before the Senate committee nearly a thousand pages. During the consideration of this act the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were printed in their entirety and laid upon the desks of the Members of Congress, in one document or another, nine different times. During the discussion of the tolls question, and a month before the enactment of any law, the Congress enjoyed the very exceptional benefit of having communicated to it officially the views of the British Government as to some of the legal aspects of granting American ships free passage through the canal.

Mr. President, before we had concluded our work we were notified by Great Britain of the importance of this step and that the conditions were not satisfactory to her. The act of 1912 was passed under all sense of responsibility as to the controversy which might arise, and the campaign of 1912 was made with full knowledge of the contention of the English Government. The Baltimore convention met at the very time that this contention was being urged by the British Government. There is not, so far as the great fundamental propositions are concerned, a single new proposition or a single new situation in this controversy. We had the treaty; we had the correspondence; we had the hearings; we had the protest of Great Britain; we had everything available which we have to-day, except the opinions of a few more experts.

Mr. President, I do not challenge, of course, the reasons which actuate men in their change of position and view; it is not my purpose in this debate to do that. But I can not refrain, as a just and legitimate argument, to note that our friends who now oppose us were once with us, and, with their great abilities, argued the cause of our Government with great power and conclusiveness.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CUMMINS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. I supposed that I had the floor, and I yielded to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to continue a colloquy with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I am not anxious about the matter, of course, but I should like to know my parliamentary status.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has been here, he thinks, an hour and a half, during which time the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has been occupying the floor. The Chair hardly thinks the Senator from Iowa can yield the floor for an hour and a half.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not intend to do so, Mr. President, but I have no quarrel with the ruling of the Chair. I suppose that at some time I shall be able to secure recognition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not desire to interfere with the wishes of the Senator from Iowa if he desires the floor at this time. I only wish, if it will not interfere with him, to make a very brief answer to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would vastly rather hear the voice of the Senator from Georgia than my own.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am not surprised that the Senator from Idaho should wish to remove this treaty, when we consider its meaning, entirely away from the correspondence of our diplomatic representatives who negotiated it, from the letter of the Secretary of State to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and from the report to the Senate upon it by the former chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Mr. Davis.

I do not contend that the contemporaneous history or that the various correspondence can in any sense change the meaning of the treaty, but I do believe that it is a splendid magnifying glass to help us see the real meaning of the treaty and the real purpose of the parties to the treaty.

With reference to the correspondence of Mr. Bulwer and Mr. Clayton, to which the Senator has called attention, that occupies an entirely different position from the correspondence and the history brought to bear upon this treaty. In that case the treaty had been signed and ratified by the Senate of the United States and by the Parliament of Great Britain. The parties with the power to make the agreement had agreed. England sought, through the letter of Mr. Bulwer, to place a limited meaning upon the treaty which had already been ratified. It was not pretended that, pending the negotiations, any such meaning was suggested by either of the parties. On our side we did not agree to the view presented by Mr. Bulwer. I do not think that that letter from Mr. Bulwer, under the circumstances, would have any effect in helping to determine the meaning of the treaty.

But what is the present case? The United States for years had insisted upon the policy of equality of treatment of the vessels of subjects of Great Britain and of citizens of the United States in the waters of each of the countries. That had been our policy, and that was the demand of the United States in its dealings with foreign Governments.

When the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made it announced fully and clearly the doctrine of equality to be extended in the waters of any canal built across Central America or the Isthmus to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States whose vessels of commerce passed through the canal. Not only so, but across any railroad that might be built from the Atlantic to the Pacific the same equality of treatment was required. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty all the way through demanded for the citizens of each country equality of treatment in the waters of any canal or over any railroad that might be constructed connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans across Central America or the Isthmus of Panama.

Here was an established policy; here was a treaty unmistakably declaring for that policy. But under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the canal was to be constructed only under the joint promotion of the two countries.

The United States concluded that it desired to be relieved of so much of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as gave to Great Britain a partnership in the proposed canal.

In the opening of the negotiations it was not suggested by the Secretary of State to our representative that we wished to get rid of the recognized policy of the United States to demand and concede equality of treatment to the owners of vessels and the commerce of the citizens of each of the countries in any canal that might be built across Central America or across the Isthmus.

When Mr. White first opened the negotiations in 1898 he reported to the Secretary of State that he believed Great Britain would yield us the complete direction of any canal and the status of sole promoter of the canal, and that she would only insist that we retain, in connection with such canal, the equality of treatment to the owners of vessels and to the commerce of the citizens of the two countries which was so fully required by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. Blaine, in his letter, declared that of course the United States stood for equality of treatment for the citizens of both countries as to their vessels and as to their commerce.

Mr. Choate later took up the negotiations, and all through the correspondence between Mr. Choate and Lord Pauncefote is the conceded proposition that equality of treatment to the citizens of the two countries as to their commerce and as to their vessels passing through the canal to be constructed was to be continued.

For the United States, in connection with this treaty, to have demanded a different status as to the canal would have been utterly contrary to its past policy, to a policy which it had advocated and for which it had pleaded for nearly a hundred years. Every letter that was exchanged indicated the purpose to continue that policy and to make the canal a public-service waterway, open alike and on equal terms to the citizens of both countries as to their commerce and as to their ships.

Mr. President, when the matter came to the Senate Mr. Davis, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in his report to the Senate clearly disclosed the purpose on the part of the United States to make a treaty which was to maintain this established policy of the United States and to continue equality of treatment to the subjects of Great Britain and to the citizens of the United States, both as to their vessels passing through the canal and as to their commerce.

You can not read the letter from Secretary Hay to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the late lamented Senator from Illinois, Mr. Cullom, without finding in it the clearest declaration that as to equality of treatment of the business of the citizens of the two countries, the United States maintain in the new treaty the same rule which was declared by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; and in the short letter of the Secretary of State to the President, handing him the last treaty, although it covers only a few lines, he dwells upon the fact that we retained in this treaty the principle of neutralization contained in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; and President Roosevelt, in sending the treaty to the Senate, although the letter of transmission was short, took space to declare that we retained in the treaty the principle of neutralization contained in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

What was that principle of neutralization which both the Secretary of State—although he wrote only about half a dozen lines about the treaty—deemed it important to mention, and the President, although he only wrote about half a dozen lines, deemed it important to remention? The eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has nothing about war; the principle of neutralization to which it applies is impartiality of treatment of the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States in the use of the canal. We declare in the very opening of the treaty, in the preamble, that the principle of neutralization contained in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is to remain in force under the new treaty.

Mr. WEST. And did not the late Senator Bacon try to have that provision stricken out, and did he not fail by a vote of 18 to 60?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I believe that is the case; but I do not intend to carry my discussion to the action of individual Senators upon the floor of the Senate. I wish simply to bring this history down to the treaty itself and to the preamble of the treaty. I do not think any outside evidence is necessary to find out what the treaty means; but if there were any doubt, unquestionably its history, in connection with the preamble, carries the broad principle of neutrality of the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator submit to a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Was it not stated in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that the reason for giving equal rights to the citizens and subjects of Great Britain and those of the United States was because of the fact that those two countries were to protect the canal?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not think that language is used as the Senator uses it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call the attention of the Senator to the last six or eight lines of the article, and ask him whether it can be properly claimed under that article that the citizens or subjects of any country were to be entitled to the same treatment as the citizens of the United States, except those of a country giving protection to the canal?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the latter suggestion of the Senator is correct—that the eighth article provided that the equality of treatment was to be extended—on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator please——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would rather not be interrupted just now. I wish to answer the Senator from Nebraska.

The principle of neutralization contained in that treaty, however, was equality of treatment to the citizens and subjects of Great Britain and the United States in the use of the canal. The reason for it in article 8, the Senator may contend, certainly, so far as other countries were concerned, was the extension to the canal of the same protection by the other countries. Now, it is true that under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty both the United States and Great Britain were to extend protection to the canal; but the equality of treatment which is the principle of neutralization was equality of treatment to the citizens of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States using the canal, both as to their commerce and as to their vessels.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, will the Senator answer this question: Suppose that partnership had been carried out, and Great Britain and the United States had jointly constructed the canal, and the citizens and subjects of the two countries had been given the use of the canal upon equal terms, would not the two countries have been perfectly at liberty to charge to the citizens and subjects of other countries higher tolls?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, if Great Britain withdrew from that partnership and ceased to give her protection to the canal, would she not be in the same position as the other countries?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not under the terms of this treaty that we have made, because under its terms she agreed to withdraw and leave the sole protection to the United States, provided we would retain the principle of neutralization; and that principle of neutralization was equality of treatment to her citizens and to our citizens.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty provided for neutralization, and the condition of neutralization would have existed even though the citizens and subjects of the United States and those of Great Britain had lower tolls than the citizens and subjects of other countries.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There would have been neutralization just the same.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the only neutralization contained in article 8 is equality of treatment of the subjects of Great Britain and of the United States in the use of the canal. Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it is true that both were to extend their protection to the canal. Now, Great Britain agreed at the instance of the United States that she would retire from her right to exercise protection, but she said: "Although I retire at your request, I do so upon condition that you will retain the principle of neutralization contained in article 8, which is equality of treatment of the vessels of citizens of Great Britain and of the citizens of the United States in the use of the canal."

That is all that is left in article 8. We made an agreement with Great Britain at our instance by which the part of article 8 which required Great Britain to exercise part of the protection should cease. We asked Great Britain to abandon that right, that voice in the control of the canal. We requested that all the feature to which the Senator refers should be removed. Great Britain conceded to our request upon condition that the principle of neutralization should not cease; and that principle of neutralization is equality of treatment of the citizens of the two countries in using the canal as to their vessels and as to their commerce.

So, Mr. President, at the very outset of this treaty we refer back to our past history and we begin with the declaration that there shall be equality of treatment to the citizens of the two countries in the use of the canal.

The next proposition in the treaty is the declaration that "the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal" shall be according to "the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople" as to the Suez Canal.

Nobody disputes the proposition that as to the Suez Canal the commerce of the citizens of all countries goes through on the basis of equality.

I do not desire to continue this discussion further. I only wish to go far enough to show that if we invoke the cotemporaneous history and invoke the correspondence we find it is all in perfect harmony with the construction which we put upon the treaty, namely, that it does declare for equality of treatment to the owners of the vessels and of the commerce of the citizens and subjects of the two countries passing through the canal.

I do not desire to refer to the part of the argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] which has reference to the construction that should be put upon a treaty where there is doubt, namely, as some contend, that we should resolve that doubt against ourselves, or, as others contend, that we should resolve it in favor of ourselves. I think the sound rule is that we should honestly seek to find out just what we did agree to do, and then live up to it.

In case of doubt, if I thought it was important to my Government, and I really seriously doubted what agreement it had made, I might favor, not legislative action seeking to resolve that doubt, but some reference of the question to an impartial arbitration by which it could be resolved. I do not agree to the view that in every instance we ought to resolve a question of doubt against our own Government. I should not be willing to do it myself. If we had made an agreement—and I did not think the agreement required us to do something that another country insisted we were required to do, and I thought doing that thing would injure our own country—I should be disposed, if I fairly reached the conclusion that we had a right that was being denied, to stand up for it and fight over it.

My own view as to this treaty is that in it we have simply agreed to what we have always stood for; in it we have simply agreed to what we stand for if we had no treaty and to what we ought to stand for if we had no treaty. If we had no treaty, I believe the traditional policy of the United States would be to charge the same rates to all commerce that passed through the canal, and I believe that policy wise and right.

If there were not any treaty, I should be in favor of making these vessels pay their part of the expense. If we reach a point where we determine that it is the wise policy of the United States to contribute something to our merchant marine, in some way to help it, I am in favor of doing it openly and above board, and plainly declaring we are doing it. If we believe we ought to give something to vessels that fly the American flag, I think the way to do it is by direct legislation and not by indirection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator were going to confer any favor upon vessels that fly the American flag in the coastwise trade he would confer it upon the whole trade, would he not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would rather confer it upon the vessels engaged in foreign trade than upon the coastwise vessels.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But if the Senator were going to confer it upon the coastwise trade he would not limit it to the part which went on a certain course, would he?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all; and with reference to the suggestion that has been made several times, that other countries could give their vessels the tolls they pay, and that the construction we take would preclude the United States from doing so, I do not think that view is sound. Under my construction of the treaty we could not give back exactly the tolls, and I do not believe any other country could give its vessels just the amount of the tolls because they went through the canal.

I do not believe Great Britain could do so without violating the terms of the treaty. Great Britain, however, may have a general policy of helping the vessels that fly the British flag and contributing toward them whether they pass through the Panama Canal or whether they pass through the Suez Canal or whether they sail without passing through any canal.

I think the United States is in no sense prevented by this treaty from giving a subsidy in any way it sees fit toward vessels that fly the American flag, provided the effort is not made simply to give it to vessels passing through the Panama Canal for the purpose of returning the tolls which they pay.

If there were no treaty, I should be thoroughly against such a plan. I think the vessels that go through the canal have already received a substantial contribution to their business through the fact that the canal has been built. I think they already will save something like two to three dollars per cargo ton by reason of the canal, even though they pay the tolls.

If we are to embark on the policy of subsidy to American vessels, at present I suppose I would be precluded from voting for a subsidy to any kind of vessel; but if we are to do it—and I am not sure that the time may not come when we will—the vessels that, above all others, I should wish to see fostered are those that are not engaged in the coastwise trade, because the coastwise vessels already have so much help through our laws which exclude the vessels of foreign countries from competing with them.

I admit a great desire to see the Stars and Stripes float all around South America. I wish to see our vessels floating in the waters of all countries. I wish to see them sail from New York to every harbor down on the eastern coast of South America, without reference to the canal. I wish to see them sail from San Francisco to all parts of the western coast of South America, and also to other foreign waters. When the time comes, if it does come, that Congress determines to do something, I think it ought to do it directly and squarely, and where the help is most needed, and in a way most beneficial to the entire country——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator from Indiana desires to continue this discussion or not. I thought he indicated that he might move for an adjournment.

Mr. KERN. I desire to take a vote on this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To-night?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just as soon as possible.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to say just a few words before the vote. [Laughter.]

I was surprised to hear the Senator from Georgia say that we do not need any outside evidence whatever to determine the meaning of this treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was not exactly my language. I said that I had no doubt as to its meaning without the outside evidence. Was not that what I said?

Mr. BORAH. I took it down, but I may have been in error. I understood the Senator to say what I have just stated. I do not think, however, there is very much difference between the two propositions. As I understood the Senator's statement it was that he had no trouble in arriving at the meaning of this treaty upon the face of the treaty itself and that outside evidence was not necessary for him to satisfy himself as to its true meaning. I think that is a fair statement of what the Senator said.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is substantially what I said.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator also to say that if we had no treaty he would be in favor of doing precisely what we are going to do under the treaty.

Those two propositions, to my mind, rather shut off the "flood of light" which is supposed to have come to us since the last session. We had the treaty before us at the former session, and certainly we had before us the policy as to whether or not we should under any circumstances, regardless of treaty, give our coastwise vessels passageway through the canal without cost. Those propositions were just as clearly before us at the former session as they are now.

The Senator also called attention to the fact that Mr. Davis's report as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations very clearly disclosed the purpose, the intent, and understanding of those who made the treaty, and it was to the effect that our treaty excluded us from freedom in the canal unless we extended the same freedom to all other nations; in other words, his contention being that Mr. Davis's report clearly established that all nations included the United States as well as the other nations of the earth.

The Senator also referred to the letter of Secretary Hay to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee transmitting the treaty the last time to the Foreign Relations Committee, in which he stated what he understood to be the meaning of the treaty, and the Senator was of the opinion that that letter was very clear in indicating the purport and meaning of the treaty.

The Senator also called attention to the letter of Secretary Hay to the President, in which he called attention to the terms and purport of the last treaty, and he called attention to President Roosevelt's letter of transmittal of the treaty to the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, all those documents were before us in 1912. We had the treaty——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Was the letter from the Secretary of State, Mr. Hay, to Mr. Cullom before us?

Mr. BORAH. If it was not actually in print before us it was available.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There has been a communication from the Department of State to us saying that it had just been taken out of the private locker of the estate of the late Secretary, and it was furnished by his wife.

Mr. BORAH. That shows how important it is to have it before us now, and remarkable is this rule which we have come to accept that we will be guided in our interpretation or construction of a treaty by a letter which was not before us when we ratified the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. That kind of testimony, which was locked up and unknown to the ratifiers of the treaty, is to be taken into evidence when we come to construe the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; it was sent to the chairman of the committee that reported the treaty. It was a letterpress copy. It was directed to Senator Cullom, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BORAH. Was it before us two years ago?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think not. As I said, it was just sent in by the Secretary of State in answer to a Senate resolution, with a statement, which I put into the RECORD, describing how he came by it.

Mr. BORAH. Did the Senate have before it the letter to which the Senator is referring at the time it ratified the treaty?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Committee on Foreign Relations had it. It was addressed to its chairman, Senator Cullom.

Mr. BORAH. Then do I understand it has been available to the Senate at all times since?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think so. I inquired of the committee, and it was not on file with the committee. Whether Senator Cullom read it to the Senate in executive session or not, of course I have no means of knowing. Nothing is preserved of the proceedings of the executive session.

Mr. BORAH. Then I understand that a letter which was not before us at the time the treaty was ratified is now before us, and that it is one of the pieces of evidence which has to do with the interpretation of the treaty at this time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is one of the pieces of evidence the Senator mentions as having been before the Senate in 1912. I simply wanted to show what my understanding of the situation was.

Mr. BORAH. I do not understand that the Senator from Connecticut lays any stress upon that letter as to the interpretation of the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I lay considerable stress upon it; so much so that I put it into the RECORD, because it is a statement from the man who authorized the negotiation of the treaty, and the same man who afterwards negotiated and signed the treaty with Panama in which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is referred to.

Mr. BORAH. And in which he exercised the right to grant exemption from tolls to Panama.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In which he said that the canal should be open and operated in all respects under the terms provided in section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which he had also drawn.

Mr. BORAH. Then I get the position of the Senator from Connecticut that, as a lawyer, he thinks in the interpretation of a treaty we must take into consideration at this time a letter interpreting it which the treaty-making power, the ratifying power, had no knowledge of at the time the treaty was ratified; that is, the Senate as a whole as distinguished from its committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator will allow me to state my own position. I take into consideration, and I think it is proper to take into consideration for what it is worth, the view of the gentleman who drew the treaty, as I think it is evidential of what he thought about it. Whether the letter was brought to the attention of the Senate which ratified the treaty of which the Senator is speaking, I have no means of knowing.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator from Connecticut think that his conception of what the language found in the treaty means is quite as good as that of the man who wrote the letter, in view of the fact that the Senator was one who had to pass upon the treaty and ratify or reject it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The intention of the gentleman who drew the treaty and conducted the very able correspondence, which is also published, with the party who signed the treaty in behalf of the other high contracting party is of some weight with me in deciding what the Government officials of this country thought they were doing at the time, and what they intended to do.

Mr. BORAH. I understand, then, the Senator from Connecticut, long prior to the time this valuable piece of evidence came into existence, had made up his mind as to what the treaty meant.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Great minds move in the same channel, Mr. President. The Senator is quite correct. I had also made up my mind upon that question, though not so firmly as it exists at present, because I regard nearly every argument made on both sides of this question as having fortified me in my original opinion. But I also think it is a grossly inexcusable economic policy to grant this privilege to a specially permitted class of vessels, and I have always thought so. On that reason alone I would vote to repeal the exemption, if no question of the treaty was involved.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator, then, is not controlled alone by the treaty, but he is opposed to this exemption as an economic proposition?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Absolutely and ab initio.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Right or wrong?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will not say right or wrong, but always right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator says that his opinion has been strengthened by speeches on both sides. I hope I did not strengthen the Senator's opinion in the discussion I indulged in on that point.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I exempt the Senator, because I did not have the pleasure of listening to all of his very able discussion of the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will supply the Senator with a copy of my speech if he will promise to read it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As between Senators I do not wish to make any invidious distinction.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I rose to call attention to the fact that it was evident the Senator from Georgia made his interpretation of this treaty upon facts which were available two years ago and that there has been nothing new to the Senator from Georgia; that his interpretation was founded at first upon the face of the treaty, and, secondly, upon the testimony with the available outside facts which were then in our possession?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is the Senator asking me a question?

Mr. BORAH. No; I was simply speaking with an interrogation point at the end of my remarks.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I will not interrupt the Senator, but when he finishes I will show him that there have been a number of matters brought to my attention since two years ago that have helped me to form my present opinion of the treaty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, how could anything help the Senator to arrive at a conclusion as to the meaning of the treaty when the Senator says that the treaty itself is plain enough upon its face as to what it means, so far as he is concerned?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator ask that as a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I ask that as a question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer that, so far as the general terms of the treaty are concerned, I think the language is perfectly clear, and the view I now have I formed two years ago. At that time I was inclined to the opinion that we could let our coastwise vessels go through free, but that it would probably also require us to let the vessels of the Dominion of Canada go through free, and I so stated on the floor of the Senate. At that time also I had not observed the fact that the treaty went beyond the owners of vessels and equality of treatment to be extended to the owners of vessels and went to the commerce of the two countries. I have read with a great deal of interest the message of President Cleveland and the message of President Harrison and the debate in the House upon the Welland Canal treaty, the act passed by Congress authorizing President Harrison to retaliate in the Welland Canal matter; and my attention has been called to the fact that the treaty extends to the commerce of the citizens of the two countries as well as to the owners of the vessels of the two countries. That had not occurred to me when the subject was up for discussion two years ago.

It is upon that line especially that I have obtained additional information within the past two years, and in one sense I have modified my construction of the treaty as presented at that time. At that time I was disposed to believe that it only applied to the owners of vessels of the two countries, and I thought that would extend to the owners of vessels of the Dominion of Canada, and I so stated. But now I believe that it extends to the commerce of the citizens of the two countries, accepting the view taken by President Cleveland and President Harrison and by Congress with reference to the Welland Canal.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator referred to the debates two years ago, and I therefore call attention——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; Mr. President, it is perfectly evident the Senator was preparing to call attention to them, and as he asked the question I answered him in advance, instead of waiting until he finished and answering him when he closed.

Mr. BORAH. I am very glad to have the Senator explain his views before I call attention to them, and I call attention to them with no desire other than to arrive at what really controlled the Senator in making up his mind upon this question.

I think we may justly insist—

Says the Senator—

I doubt whether it would be successfully controverted—that, so far as our coastwise vessels are concerned, this treaty does not apply to them.

The Senator at that time, as I understand him, had made up his mind by reason of the facts which were before him, to wit, the treaty and the correspondence which he referred to in his last remarks to-day, all of which were in existence at that time, to the effect that the coastwise vessels were not included under the treaty.

Indeed, in the communication from the Attorney General embodying the views brought to our attention by Great Britain, it is stated that upon that subject, with proper regulations, it is probable that no question by Great Britain would be made.

I think that is true. I think that Great Britain has really never made any serious contention as to the coastwise trade. I think when you construe the letter of Mr. Innes together with the letter of Earl Grey, you will find that, taken together, there can not be evolved from them a distinct objection to the coastwise trade; at least, they were not willing to put it beyond the power of diplomacy to settle. I think this question of exempting the coastwise trade is a thing which we have urged and accentuated here at home far more than it has been urged abroad. It is an evidence of our generosity.

Now, fortifying that view, one that we can logically deduce from article 3, section 1, and the attitude of Great Britain upon it, with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Galveston case, in which they held, in effect, that language of this kind was not applicable to coastwise vessels; that it was no discrimination under language practically similar to the language found in this treaty to extend privileges to coastwise vessels that were not extended to foreign vessels, we can sustain the provision freeing coastwise vessels from tolls.

That decision squarely sustains the positon that the treaty does not apply to coastwise vessels.

I call attention to that, Mr. President, to demonstrate the fact that it was not necessary to have this which the Senator from North Carolina has referred to—the new evidence, the flood of light—to enable Senators to arrive at a definite conclusion as to our coastwise vessels. That proposition was easily sustainable, as I understand from the language of the Senator, by reason of the facts which were then before him, and that no new facts have been added, so far as that particular feature of the controversy is concerned.

If that be true, a vast amount of this discussion would seem to be wholly irrelevant, so far as the particular matter that we have under consideration is concerned, because we are only dealing with coastwise vessels, not vessels engaged in coastwise trade, and not only vessels of the United States, but vessels which belong to the nationals.

I do not care to go further into the matter this evening.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in reference to what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has said about the fact that the terms coastwise vessels or coastwise ships or coastwise trade do not appear in the treaty I have simply to say that if the rules prescribed in the treaty bind us at all, if section 1 of article 3 binds us to equality of treatment to the ships of the subjects or citizens of the countries, it is equality that we contracted for. It is not equality as to ships in the coastwise trade or in the river trade or in the foreign trade. In the language of the treaty they are on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination as to ships, subjects, citizens, or countries as to the conditions or rate of tolls through the canal. That is what we contracted for—equality. If it is equal treatment to say that we will pass all our ships in the coastwise trade through free and we will charge the ships of every other nation in their coastwise trade, so be it. But that does not seem to me to be equality. If an owner of a Canadian ship has to pay $5,000 or $10,000 to get through that canal and to his competitor, the owner of an American ship in the coastwise trade, the guard takes off his hat and says, "No charge, sir; pass through free," I would not consider that as being treated on terms of equality, so that there is no distinction or discrimination between me as a citizen or a subject or between the country that I belong to or the flag that I support and the vessel or citizen with whom I was competing.

It is that which is contracted for, and I am unable to understand how anybody who admits that we are bound to equality of treatment can claim that it is not a discrimination to charge all Canadian vessels engaged in exactly the same trade from the east or Atlantic coast of their country to the west or Pacific coast of their country, as they will be engaged in it, through that canal, their trade only originating and terminating a few degrees of latitude to the north of us. I can not conceive how that absolute inequality of treatment can be considered to be equality of treatment.

This is not simply a question involving Canadian ships as compared with our coastwise ships. While the ships of Mexico or any other nation that is willing to observe the rules as they are laid down here have no contractual right, which was especially avoided by the negotiators of the treaty, as the high contracting parties had when they signed the contract, any nation that is willing to observe the rules has all the rights to equality of treatment that either high contracting party has.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator to assume in his argument that he believed the treaty bound us to equality of treatment, and coastwise vessels did not come within that term.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no. I understand the position of the Senator from Idaho is that we are not bound to equality of treatment under the treaty.

Mr. BORAH. Neither with reference to coastwise vessels nor over-sea vessels.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the men who drew the treaty, Mr. President, stated that we were bound by these rules. I will be very brief, because I consider that the subject is worn almost threadbare. Mr. Hay, in his letter to Senator Cullom, distinctly stated that we were bound by these rules. In his opinion——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. An American canal.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He did say that, and it is an American canal.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And it is owned by the American Government.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And it is owned by the American Govment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But we seem to have a partnership with England in its management, according to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We have all the rights in the canal as an owner and operator and maker of regulations. We can do anything we want in the canal as our own, provided we live up to the agreements that we have made.

Senators might just as well claim that when we made a contract with the Republic of Panama, from whom we got our right to build the canal, we are not bound to give them the conditions of use of the canal which we stated in the treaty.

Now, John Hay says:

> No foreign powers in the 50 years that had elapsed had effectively intimated a desire to participate in or contribute to the construction of the canal—

That was under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—> that no other power had now any right in the premises, or anything to give up or part with as the consideration for acquiring such a contract right; that they must rely—

That is, the other powers—

> upon the good faith of the United States in its declaration to Great Britain in the treaty that it adopts the rules and principles of neutralization therein set forth, and that it was not quite correct to speak of the nations other than the United States as being bound by the rules of neutralization set forth in the treaty; that it was the United States which bound itself by them as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that the only way in which they were bound by them was that they must comply with them if they would use the canal.

That is what the man who drew the treaty and sent it to Senator Cullom thought about it.

Mr. BORAH. What has that to do with tolls?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It has to do with equality of treatment, and as to whether we are bound by the rules which provide for equality of treatment.

Mr. BORAH. Yes, exactly; but that is arguing in a circle. The question is, What do the rules require us to do?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The question which the Senator asks and the foundation of his whole argument rests upon the fact that we are not bound by the rules, but that only other nations are bound by the rules; and I am saying that the man who drew the treaty says we are bound by the rules and that the other nations are bound only by the rules if they want to use the canal, and the only penalty for their violation of the rules is that they must cease to use the canal if they are not bound by them; we are not only bound by the rules but we are bound to enforce the rules. Senators who claim that America has the sole jurisdiction over the canal must admit that if we are not to enforce the rules, of course they will not be enforced at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Who would enforce them?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The canal would be thrown loose to the wide, wide world, to be wrangled over by everybody, if we did not enforce the rules over our own canal.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to continue reading Mr. Hay's communication?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As soon as the Senator from Idaho finishes there are a few words which I wish to say.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. Hay continues:

> But the President was apprehensive that such a provision would give to the other nations the footing of parties to the contract and give them a contract right to the use of the canal. And in view of the action of the Senate on the former treaty, striking out article 3, which provided for bringing the treaty, when ratified, to the notice of other powers and inviting them to adhere to it, which seemed to mean practically the same thing, he believed that the proposed provision would meet the same fate. This was represented to His Majesty's Government, and it was also insisted on the part of the United States that there was a strong national feeling among the peoples of the United States against giving to foreign powers a contract right to intervene in an affair so peculiarly American as this canal when constructed would be; that, notwithstanding the similar provision in the Clayton Bulwer treaty, no foreign powers in the 50 years that had elapsed had effectively intimated a desire to participate in or contribute to the construction of the canal; that no other power had now any right in the premises or anything to give up or part with as the consideration for acquiring such a contract right; that they must rely upon the good faith of the United States in its declaration to Great Britain in the treaty that it adopts the rules and principles of neutralization therein set forth.

Does the Senator from Connecticut contend that "neutralization" means equality of tolls?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is my understanding of it; yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Exactly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And I think that was John Hay's understanding of it. He says it was.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I do not understand Mr. Hay to make any such statement. Mr. Hay was too familiar with the word "neutralization" to contend that "neutralization" meant equality of tolls. For instance, that canal could be neutralized in the sense in which we use the word "neutralization" and yet charge a different toll to every nation in the world whose vessels passed through it. I have never heard until in connection with this particular treaty that "neutralization" meant equality of tolls. It does not mean that in the Suez Canal. I do not believe it was used in that sense in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or can fairly receive such an application.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. Was it not the contention of Sir Edward Grey that that was what was meant by the words "equality of tolls" in the case of the Suez Canal?

Mr. BORAH. That was the contention which he made after this controversy arose, but it was not the contention which was made prior to that time, so far as I know. It was certainly not the doctrine of English authors on international law and treaties.

Mr. STERLING. It seemed to be the understanding of our ambassador, Mr. Choate, was it not, in his interview or conversation with Lord Lansdowne?

Mr. BORAH. I do not so interpret Mr. Choate's letter. The word "neutralization" necessarily implies a controversy between two parties, and a third party who is neutral as between them—a condition of war and a neutral territory; and the United States might be absolutely neutral and agree to devote the canal to neutrality and yet have an entirely different proposition as to charging tolls on the vessels of various countries.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Nabraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest, however, to the Senator from Idaho that he is, to some extent, bound by what the treaty itself says on the subject.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And in article 3 the opening paragraph rather settles what is meant by "neutralization."

Mr. BORAH. I do not think so, if it be meant that it settles it favorable to equality of tolls.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I et me read it to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I shall be very glad to have the Senator reread that portion of the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course I think the equality of tolls is only a very small part of the neutralization; but here is what the treaty says in article 3:

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

Then follow paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, which relate largely to war——

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the condition of neutrality of the canal during war.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for just a moment, article 3, rule 1, does not say that this canal shall be free and open to all nations or to any nation, but it says:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules.

The five rules which follow are just as much an obligation of observation in order to get in on the floor of equality as is any other part of the treaty.

I do not think the Senator from Nebraska will contend that the United States is bound by rules 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 to observe them, the same as are the other nations of the earth, and yet no nation can secure the freedom of this canal on terms of equality unless it observes rules 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I agree with the Senator fully, and I also agree with him upon the interpretation of rule 1. I think that the word "nations" there means customer nations, not the proprietor Nation; but I think that the neutralization does include, among a large number of other things, equality of tolls among customer nations.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to another authority; it is not the authority of Sir Edward Grey nor of Mr. Choate, but an authority which spoke before this treaty was negotiated. I refer to Mr. John Bassett Moore himself, who, writing in the New York Times of March 4, 1900, says:

Equality of tolls has also been treated as a feature, or, perhaps, rather as a condition, of neutralization.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I am familiar with that statement of Mr. Moore, but I have never found anywhere that Mr. Moore himself accepted that doctrine. That was true with reference to one particular instance which Mr. Moore cites in his works, but Mr. Moore—and I think I am justified in saying this—judging from his books, has never indorsed that doctrine of neutralization; and I will say to the Senator, who I know has given some attention to it, that I would be glad if the Senator would bring into the Senate any leading author of international law who gives the construction of the word "neutralization" which is sought to be given to it in this treaty in order to sustain the proposition of equality of tolls. That doctrine may exist somewhere, but I have gone through the authorities and collected them in a brief, which I have at my office, and which, if the Senate wants to hear later, I may use, and I have been unable to find a single leading author upon this subject who treats the doctrine of neutralization in this sense. I do not assert such may not be found, but I have not found them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whether or not the Senator has been able to find any writer upon diplomatic subjects or upon international law who states that equality is necessarily a part of neutralization, I do not know and I do not care; and I do not see why anybody else should care. We are construing this treaty, and this treaty says that the United States adopts as the basis of neutralization certain rules, the first of which provides for entire equality of treatment. That puts entire equality of treatment at the very basis and foundation of the whole thing.

Mr. BORAH. What the treaty says is:

The United States adopts, as a basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople.

Now, I wish the Senator from Connecticut would draw upon his memory and tell me what article in the Constantinople convention provides for equality of tolls?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not have the book in my hand, and my memory is like the old pump—it would suck if I attempted to draw upon it; but the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does provide for entire equality. Whether the Suez Canal convention does or does not, I do not know; I assume it does. I think, after reading the report of the great chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Cushman Davis, in which he exulted that that great principle had been firmly established and extolled the virtues and magnanimity of all the nations of the Old World because they had thrown the Suez Canal open on terms of entire equality to the commerce of all the world, that it is a late day to question the fact that there is equal treatment in the Suez Canal.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I have here, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, article 12 of the Suez Canal convention, which I think is a counterpart practically of rule 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and which reads as follows:

The high contracting parties, by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal, a principle which forms one of the bases of the present treaty, agree that none of them shall endeavor to obtain with respect to the canal territorial or commercial advantages or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded.

Mr. BORAH. I do not understand that that covers the question of tolls at all.

Mr. STERLING. I think it does by fair implication and intendment cover the question of tolls.

Mr. BORAH. You might argue by implication that it covered it, but certainly there is no specific designation of it; neither have I been able to find it in the Suez convention at all. You can have the free use of a canal; you can admit all the ships of all countries to a canal and inhibit yourself from preventing any ship of any nation from going through the canal without disposing of the question of equality of tolls. That is one of the vices of the argument which has been based upon Mr. Blaine's contention. Mr. Blaine did not contend that we should have exclusive control of the canal. Nobody has ever contended that we should have exclusive control of the canal; but to say that we shall not have exclusive use of the canal is a different thing from saying that we shall not have the advantage which arises by reason of the incident of ownership.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I can not construe "equality of treatment" in any other way than involving equality of treatment as to the tolls paid for passing through the canal, and I think that is surely what is meant by article 12 of the Suez convention. The word "free" is used several times throughout the Suez Canal convention, but it is only in article 12 that reference is made to equality of treatment in that canal, and that no advantage shall be taken in any agreement that may be made between the different nations in regard to the use of the canal.

Mr. BORAH. Well, rule 12 of the Suez convention is not in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in any event.

Mr. STERLING. I say that rule 12 is not, but that rule 12 in the Suez Canal convention is the foundation for rule 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote convention; that it is the counterpart of rule 1.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, reading further from this letter, it says:

That they must rely upon the good faith of the United States in its declaration to Great Britain in the treaty that it adopts the rules and principles of neutralization therein set forth and that it was not quite correct to speak of the nations other than the United States as being bound by the rules of neutralization set forth in the treaty; that it was the United States which bound itself by them as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that the only way in which they were bound by them was that they must comply with them if they would use the canal.

Mr. President, the only thing that Mr. Hay is discussing there is the question of neutralization; and if neutralization involves the proposition of equality of tolls, of course Senators are correct who claim that Mr. Hay placed that construction upon the treaty; but you have got to give the word "neutralization" an interpretation which has never, in my opinion, been given to it before upon a contested matter, whenever you say that "neutralization" involves the question of equality of tolls.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Hay says in his letter that we are bound by the rules; and rule 1 provides for equality.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator claim that the United States is bound by rules from 2 to 6 the same as the other nations of the earth?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who, I understand, desires to take the floor; but, with his permission, I will say that my judgment about that is that these rules are substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, that they were made with reference to the alternative proposition of whether the canal would be built by the United States Government as an owner or by a canal company; and I think that so much of the rules as are applicable to us in the situation in which we are placed will bind us, and that the portion that is inappropriate from the fact that we have become the owner will not bind us. I think that the rules bind us furthermore for this reason, among others. Rule 2 provides:

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

Now, the Senator says we are not bound by that rule. If we are not, why did they go on and say—the United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder?

If they did not think that rule bound the United States, why did they want to exempt the United States to that extent?

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand, then, that the Senator takes the position that, if the United States were at war with any nation on earth, and should violate the rule which provides that—it would forfeit its right to the use of the canal?

the canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think that the right of the United States will be forfeited by doing its duty under the treaty. I think if the United States were at war, if it were a belligerent, of course, these rules would not apply to it at all. If we should become involved in war, we would manage that canal to protect this country, and not to make it of service to our enemies. That is admitted in the correspondence by the foreign office of Great Britain.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; Great Britain conceded that to us after a time, on the theory that we had extended our sovereignty; but that was a concession which Great Britain made to us. What I want to know is, what would be the contention upon our part as to what our rights are in case Great Britain should not see fit to concede them?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator is in the business of receiving concessions from Great Britain, he can stay in that line of business. I am not.

Mr. BORAH. I misunderstood the Senator. I thought that was his precise attitude.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; Great Britain admits it, I say. She admits that. She makes no claim to the contrary.

Mr. BORAH. But suppose she did not admit it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If she did not admit it, she would have to fight. She would have to fight to take the canal away from us or to manage it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. War does away with the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If we are at war, the provisions of the treaty which may interfere in any way with our military operations, or which may in any way imperil the successful defense or offense that this country wants to make, will be set aside and not observed. Nobody expects a belligerent to do otherwise. Furthermore, the frequent queries as to whether we are obliged, because we have guaranteed equality of treatment, to transport through the canal the vessels of war of some foreign power with whom we are at war, so that they can get into a better position to assault us, is, of course, absurd. Of course we would not do it. We are not bound to do it when we are a belligerent, and even if I have no fear of any foreign Government I have enough respect for their intelligence to think that they would not be hasty to put their sole weapons of offense in our custody to be transported from one ocean to the other.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, here is a treaty containing five rules which were made to cover a condition of war; they relate to a condition of war; and yet the Senator evades the proposition of whether or not they apply to us by saying that if we should be engaged in war of course the treaty would be suspended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, absolutely.

Mr. BORAH. Yet the very purpose of making those rules was to control a condition of war.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, the purpose is to neutralize the canal from warlike operations and destruction of the canal, and also, unless we are one of the belligerents, to compel us to treat all belligerents on terms of equality and not to play favorites or play one against the other.

If two other nations are at war with each other, we shall have to administer the canal absolutely impartially between them. The rules specify how their vessels shall enter and leave, that the vessel of one belligerent shall not leave until 24 hours after the vessel of the other belligerent, and so on. We must enforce all those rules. I think myself that the proposition is sown with dragon's teeth, and I think we shall get into all manner of trouble in the future by attempting to hold the scales evenly between foreign contending parties; but that is neither here nor there with relation to this question. As to these rules applying to us as sovereign owner of the canal, to be used against us by a belligerent in arms against us, it never occurred to me, in my wildest flights of imagination—and I have seen some strange visions on some occasions—to think that anybody would claim that.

Mr. BORAH. I hope I have not unduly aggravated the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not in the least. I will shake hands with the Senator very gladly.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator has lit from his flight of imagination, let me call him back to a proposition:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules.

We have to observe the rules; but the Senator contends that we are relieved from observing them because they are suspended at the very time we should observe them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I claim that in time of war we are not bound to observe them.

Mr. BORAH. They were made for time of war.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They were made with reference to the conditions I have suggested, in order that the use of the canal might not be granted to some belligerents and denied to others.

Mr. BORAH. The same argument would apply to the vessels of commerce, because vessels of commerce and of war are in the same phrase.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think they are in the same phrase; but what is the argument that applies to both of them?

Mr. BORAH. Why, our sovereignty has been extended over the canal, which was intended to be built in the first instance by a private corporation, and therefore certain conditions and certain rules were to obtain. If by reason of the fact that it was built by the Government itself those rules have been suspended, why would not that apply to vessels of commerce as well as to vessels of war?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not believe there is an international authority on the face of the globe who would deny that when we are belligerents, when we are at war with a foreign power, the provisions of this treaty, under the rules that operate against us as a belligerent, would be absolutely set aside under the law of nations. That is a well-known international principle.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator from Connecticut for a moment.

Mr. BORAH. I think I have the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think I have the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. WEST. Was not that precisely the case when the War between the States came on? The Constitution recognized slavery, but it was in time of war. Lincoln made his proclamation of emancipation while the Constitution recognized slavery; but that was in time of war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not exactly see the application of the Senator's suggestion, but it may come to me later.

In order to relieve myself from the perilous position in which I have been placed by advancing this doctrine, in the mind of the Senator from Connecticut, whose esteem I covet at all times, I wish to read from Mr. Olney, a fair authority upon the subject, I think—certainly a great lawyer, and, to my mind, a great Secretary of State. He had a vast amount of Americanism in him, which is a very valuable thing in that office, I think, at all times.

Upon page 86 of the proceedings of the American Society of International Law for the year 1913 he says:

It seems difficult to successfully contend that the United States is included.

(a) The treaty is a contract by which the proprietor of a canal fixes the terms upon which it grants the use of the canal to its customers.

* * * * * * *

It can not reasonably be argued that, in fixing terms for the use of its canal by customers, the United States looked upon itself as one of the customers.

(c) The words under construction are in substance the first of a set of six rules adopted by the United States as the basis of the neutralization of the canal.

But the other five certainly apply only to parties other than the United States, so that there is the strongest reason for holding that the first of them is to be given a like application.

It was the view of Mr. Olney that these five rules did not apply to the United States, and therefore the provision in rule 1, "all nations observing these rules," could not include the United States, because the United States could not observe those rules.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the United States, in exempting or in taxing its coastwise trade, is not regarding itself as one of its customers. The United States does not own the vessels upon which it proposes to bestow this favor. They are owned by citizens of the United States. The United States, of course, is not its own customer. As Mr. Olney says, nobody contends that it is. If, however, the Senator from Idaho still has such a high opinion of the authority he has quoted as he appears to have when he makes that statement, I should advise him to follow his lead and vote for this repeal, because Mr. Olney advocates doing so.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but he advocates it for a reason that does not apply to me. He put it on the ground of party loyalty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But if he is such a high authority, the Senator ought to follow him in all he recommends.

Mr. BORAH. He gives as a reason that we should follow the President. If I were a member of the Democratic Party and was following anybody, I do not know of any man I would rather follow than the President; but I do not feel any obligation to change my vote until I change my mind, in view of the fact that I am not a member of that party. I do not understand that Mr. Olney has changed his view of the treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, when the Senator from Idaho, in one of his speeches some time ago, did me the honor of referring to some remarks I made two years ago when the canal-tolls bill was before the Senate, I hoped at the conclusion of that speech to obtain the floor and to make a brief reply, but I did not obtain recognition. Since then, in one of his later statements, he has referred to the meaning of the word "neutralization." Before I undertake to reply to his reference to my speech of two years ago I wish to call attention to the fact that, as the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has mentioned, not only does Mr. Moore, in his digest of international law, refer to the term "neutralization" as having the meaning of impartial treatment with reference to commerce, as distinguished from what was formerly considered its meaning, impartiality of treatment with reference to war, but Mr. Choate, in his correspondence with the Secretary of State, refers to the term "principle of neutralization" in this treaty as meaning equality of treatment between the citizens of the United States and the citizens of Great Britain in their commerce. That will be found in a letter of Mr. Choate's dated August 20, 1901, in which he says:

And that said "canals or railways" being open to the subjects and citizens of Great Britain and the United States on equal terms shall also be open on like terms to the subjects and citizens of other States, which I believe to be the real general principle of neutralization (if you choose to call it so) intended to be asserted by this eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; "if you choose to so call it."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Ah, but it is so called. He regards the term as rather a novel use.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; with Mr. Choate's knowledge, I should think he would.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not desire to debate the matter with the Senator from Idaho just now, as I have waited so long to get the floor. I desire to finish what I have to say now rather than be interrupted. I did not interrupt the Senator, hoping to get the floor myself later on.

Mr. BORAH. I shall not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He does concede that it is a novel use, but he says that that is its meaning as we use the term in this treaty, according to the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The fact that we give the words its modern use was declared by Mr. Choate while the treaty was being negotiated by him.

Mr. McCUMBER rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wish to say to the Senator that that is just exactly what Mr. Hay said in January of 1901, in his correspondence with the British ambassador. If the Senator will allow me, I will read just what he said in answer to the proposition contained in article 3–A, proposed by Lord Lansdowne. On this point his answer is:

The preamble of the draft treaty retained the declaration that the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not impaired.

Now, there is no neutralization in article 8 unless the neutralization pertains to equality, because article 8 deals only with the matter of equality.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Idaho not to interrupt me until I finish the few remarks I wish to make. It is late and I desire my reply to a part of his speech made at once.

As the Senator from North Dakota has said, there is nothing left in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which we continue in existence except the equality of treatment of the commerce of citizens of the United States and citizens of Great Britain. The other provisions of the treaty were provisions providing joint protection by Great Britain, the United States, and other countries. We wiped that out by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and the only thing we continued we declared to be the principle of neutralization. That is equality of treatment of the citizens of the two countries in the use of the canal; and Mr. Choate expressly declares in his letter to Mr. Hay that that is what we meant by the term.

The Senator called attention to some extracts from remarks I made two years ago. If he had read a little further from what I then said, he would have seen that I expressed the opinion that the effect of letting our coastwise vessels go through the canal free would in all probability be that we must also permit the vessels of the Dominion of Canada to go through free as well as our own.

At that time, so far as I know, the debate upon the floor of the Senate treated the question of equality provided for in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as one affecting the owners of the vessels. The broader meaning applying it to the commerce of the countries did not attract my attention, and I think it attracted little the attention of any of the Senators. Since then there has been brought to our attention the action of Mr. Cleveland and of Mr. Harrison.

The Welland Canal treaty undertook to secure "to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion of Canada on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion." This language Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Harrison and the Congress of the United States declared extended not alone to the owners of vessels but to the commerce of the citizens of the two countries. We made an issue with Great Britain and enforced our view and enforced recognition of the fact that under that language in the Welland Canal treaty equality of treatment of the commerce of the two nations must be given. We enforced the proposition that Canada could not be permitted to give to vessels landing at Montreal a rebate of tolls charged at the Welland Canal which was not also given to vessels landing in New York State.

Upon the same principle there could not be given to a vessel sailing from New York and landing at Seattle a rebate of tolls charged at the Panama Canal which was not also given to a vessel landing at Vancouver. There could not be given to a vessel sailing from New York to San Francisco a rebate that was not also given to a vessel sailing from Halifax to San Francisco.

How does the language of the present treaty vary from the language of the Welland Canal treaty?

The language of the present treaty is:

The canal shall be free and open * * * on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

It is not limited to the owners of the vessels; it extends to the commerce of the citizens; so that the United States is squarely committed to the proposition on a similar treaty that we can not avoid its effect by showing that we have not discriminated against the owners of vessels. The United States is committed to the proposition that there must be no discrimination as to the commerce of the citizens of the two countries; and if we were right in our contention with reference to the Welland Canal, we are wrong now if we undertake to give free passage to our coastwise vessels and not extend the same free passage to the commerce of the citizens of the Dominion of Canada. We are committed to that proposition.

But the Senator from Idaho, when I called attention to the Welland Canal treaty about two weeks ago, said that while Canada yielded and repealed the rebate she never conceded that our construction of the treaty was right. I found from the press that he had discovered something which simply wiped out my argument by the discovery. I found that out the next morning in a city paper. Unfortunately, I was called away when he made those remarks, and I did not have an opportunity at the time to answer them.

Mr. President, of course Canada never yielded her construction of the treaty, but she yielded to our contention. She never admitted that our construction was right, but she revoked her rebates and gave us what we demanded.

It is not a question as to what Canada insisted upon then, but a question as to what we insist upon. Are we now to insist upon something that we then repudiated? We then insisted that the treaty extended to the commerce of the citizens. We have never withdrawn from that contention. We went so far as to put a penalty on Canada. We passed the retaliatory statute. Two Presidents of the United States and the Congress of the United States strongly declared that the treaty extended to the commerce of the citizens, and an act of Congress was passed and the President issued a proclamation of retaliation against Canada. Canada then thought she was right, but she yielded.

What do we do now? We are proposing to reverse the position that we then took as to another treaty without reversing our position as to that treaty. We stand as to the Welland Canal treaty on the act of Congress, which has never been repealed. Under that act to-day, if Canada should again give a rebate, the President would be required to stop it by retaliatory procedure.

What matters it whether Canada thought we were right or wrong? She yielded and we stand committed to such a construction of the treaty. Are we now on the other treaty to take an entirely different view? Are we to say that we stand on the act of Congress requiring the President to place a retaliatory duty upon Canadian commerce if she undertakes to give a rebate in Canada to goods discharged at Montreal, and yet as to this treaty shall we take exactly the opposite view, though the language is just as broad as the language in the Canadian treaty? The act of Congress commits us to prevent Canada from discriminating against the commerce of citizens of the United States in favor of the commerce of citizens of Canada. Shall we force our construction on Canada to help our citizens in the one case and disregard that construction to the injury of citizens of Canada in the other case?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator permit just one question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is not the Senator's argnment as to the similarity of the two treaties based upon the contention that the term "all nations" in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty includes the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course, the Senator's argument, then, would not be addressed to those who do not so believe.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have already presented that part of the discussion. I am now replying to the effort to discrimi nate the coastwise trade from the vessels of the United States engaged in foreign trade. I am meeting the contention that the coastwise trade can be discriminated from the vessels engaged in foreign trade, and I am undertaking to show that for us to undertake now to make that discrimination is to fly in the teeth of an existing act of Congress.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Georgia to be arguing that there is no distinction to be drawn under the treaty between the coastwise trade and overseas trade?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not argue that.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I gathered that from the Senator's statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The position I am taking is that under the language of the Welland Canal treaty it was insisted that the equality of treatment extended to the commerce of the citizens, not simply to the owners of the vessels. That there is a distinction between coastwise trade and vessels engaged in foreign trade is undoubtedly true; but under the Welland Canal treaty we insisted that mere equality of the treatment of the owners of the vessels did not meet the requirement of the treaty; that the treaty——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission, what our Government insisted upon in the Welland Canal controversy was that the equality provided for in that treaty was evaded by a system introduced by the Canadian Government which operated as a positive discrimination against the American commerce carried by American ships engaged in our lake and canal trade.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am very familiar with what our contention was. Canada insisted that the treaty only extended to equality of treatment with the owners of vessels—Canada gave the same rates through the canal to vessels owned by citizens of the United States that were charged vessels owned by British subjects. We insisted that the treaty required equality of treatment of commerce of citizens of the two countries, and both President Cleveland and President Harrison repudiated the suggestion or the claim of Canada that the treaty stopped with equality of treatment of the owners of vessels. Canada extended equality of treatment to the owners of the vessels of the two countries. She charged the same tolls for vessels owned by citizens of Canada that she charged for vessels owned by citizens of the United States. But when the vessels of Canada discharged their commerce at Montreal she gave them a rebate of 90 per cent of the tolls. Our contention was that that was a failure to give equality of treatment to the commerce of the citizens of the two countries; that merchants of New York buying on the New York side, when the vessels delivered cargoes there, were entitled as to their commerce to the same charges when going through the canal that merchants of Montreal were entitled to as to a charge on their commerce.

What I say is that if our contention was sound about that, then the merchants of Halifax are entitled to the same rates at the canal on their commerce coming from San Francisco that the merchants of New York are entitled to on their commerce coming from San Francisco, and that the commerce of the citizens of Halifax can not be burdened with toll charges from San Francisco through the canal when the commerce of the citizens of New York is charged with no such tolls. All along the entire coast the same principle will follow. As the treaty extends to the commerce of the citizens, it makes it equally as impossible for us to permit the coastwise vessels to go through free as it would be impossible for us to admit vessels engaged in foreign trade to go through free.

Of course, if we have the right to let all of them go through free, there is no use for this argument. I am only undertaking to meet, by the use of the Welland Canal treaty, and the attitude of the United States upon it, the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho that we can permit the coastwise vessels to go through free even if vessels engaged in foreign trade can not go through free.

I am also calling attention to this treaty, as the Senator wished to know if any information had come to me since the discussion of two years ago. I am calling his attention to my present information about this treaty and about the attitude of the United States with reference to it, which I did not have at that time and which was not considered, so far as I can recall, in the discussion two years ago. At any rate, I had not grasped it.

I believe, Mr. President, that the construction we placed upon the Welland Canal treaty was sound. I believe the language of this treaty is so broad that it extends to the commerce of the respective countries, and that we can no more exempt our coastwise vessels than we can exempt the vessels engaged in foreign trade.

Some little time ago, during the afternoon, I presented briefly an argument, which satisfied me, to show that under the terms of the treaty, under the language of the preamble, and under the reference to the Suez Canal, we were entirely committed to the proposition that the Panama Canal should be a common carrier for commercial vessels which would transport the vessels of citizens of Great Britain and of the United States upon terms of entire equality.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 3, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our heavenly Father, be graciously near to us as we enter upon the new congressional day, that we may be quick to conceive, strong to do the right as it is given us to see the right, for of Thee and through Thee are all things; hence we realize that if our work is not in consonance with the laws Thou hast ordained it will come to naught. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

HOMESTEAD PATENTS FOR DESERTED WIVES.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Public Lands reported a bill to provide for issuing of patents for public lands claimed under the homestead laws by deserted wives. The bill was filed yesterday, and it has been placed on the Private Calendar, No. 255. It is clearly a bill that ought to go to the Union Calendar. I ask that the transfer of the bill be made accordingly.

The SPEAKER. What is the bill about?

Mr. RAKER. The bill is about the issuing of patents for homesteads to deserted wives. It is a general bill, and relates to no particular person or individual. It is a disposition of public lands, and it is clearly a mistake that it went to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MANN. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. The number of the bill is House bill 16296, to provide for issuing of patents for public lands claimed under the homestead laws by deserted wives.

Mr. RAKER. I have a copy of the bill here as amended by the committee. The bill as amended is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in any case in which persons have regularly initiated claims to public lands as settlers thereon under the provisions of the homestead laws and the wife of such homestead settler or entryman, while residing upon the homestead claim and prior to submission of final proof of residence, cultivation, and improvement as prescribed by law, has been abandoned and deserted by her husband for a period of more than one year, the deserted wife shall, upon establishing the fact of such abandonment or desertion to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior, be entitled to submit proof upon such claim and obtain patent therefor in her name in the form, manner, and subject to the conditions prescribed in section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and acts supplemental thereto and amendatory thereof: Provided, That in such cases the wife shall be required to show residence upon, cultivation, and improvement of the homestead by herself for such time as when, added to the time during which her husband prior to desertion had complied with the law, would aggregate the full amount of residence, improvement, and cultivation required by law: And provided further, That the published and posted notices of intention to submit final proof in such cases shall recite the fact that the proof is to be offered and patent sought by applicant as a deserted wife, and, prior to its submission, notice thereof shall be served upon the husband of the applicant in such a manner and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

The SPEAKER. It was evidently an accidental clerical error, because House bill 16476, also introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], is evidently a private bill, and that is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. RAKER. No, Mr. Speaker; I understand that the Speaker ruled two years ago that when a bill provides anything for a municipality it is not a private bill. The bill the Speaker refers to grants 40 acres of land to the city of Susanville. Therefore that bill should go upon the Union Calendar.

Mr. MANN. That is correct. The bill is properly referred.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill H. R. 16296, Private Calendar, No. 255, will be transferred from the Private Calendar to the Union Calendar.

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I desire leave to extend my remarks by publishing an address delivered by Mr. Samuel Untermyer at Pittsburgh on the 22d of May last.

The SPEAKER. About what?

Mr. GORDON. Upon the reasons and remedies for our business troubles. It discusses at length these bills that are now pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing in the RECORD a speech made by Mr. Samuel Untermyer at Pittsburgh in May.

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire what it is about.

Mr. GORDON. It discusses at length these three bills that are now being considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARNHART. The trust bills?

Mr. GORDON. The bills now pending.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not pending. Two of them have been disposed of.

Mr. GORDON. None of them have been disposed of.

Mr. MANN. They have been disposed of in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GORDON. None of them have been voted on.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; they have, in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARNHART. I do not see that this speech should be printed in the RECORD now, and I will object for the present.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, upon what subject?

Mr. GORDON. I want to read this speech into the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is necessary to hear from Mr. Untermyer this morning, and therefore I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with the proceedings under Calendar Wednesday for to-day and to resume considerations of the trust bills under the continuing order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas moves to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business for to-day and to proceed with the trust bills.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard on that motion, and under the rules I am entitled to five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. WINGO. If my motion carries, the result will be to put in an additional day in the consideration of the trust bills. That will mean that we will get through with those bills this week. It will mean that we will get through with them a day earlier, that we will get through with this session of Congress a day earlier, and get home a day earlier.

I made the same motion on last Wednesday, and some 13 of us who had a desire to hasten the public business voted for the motion. Most of those 13 stayed here. One or two and possibly three of those who voted against it stayed here. The other gentlemen, I know, were engaged in public business—evidently they were, although some of them attended the ball game, some went to the golf links, and some attended an afternoon tea and sipped tea with the ladies. There is no ball game this afternoon at the ball park, there is no afternoon tea, and the golf links are not in very good condition. Therefore, I trust that gentlemen will vote for my motion and stay here and continue the consideration of the trust bills. I am perfectly willing to stay here until hog-killing time, so far as I am concerned, to pass the bills constituting the party program; but if we can expedite business and get through a little bit earlier I think we should do so. I have heard one or two suggestions from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that the country wants a rest, and he quoted a good Democratic authority last night, saying that the country wants a rest. But however that may be, this is a practical proposition that I have offered, and I do not think it will destroy the sanctity of Calendar Wednesday, as some have complained that we want to do.

I think it would be treating Calendar Wednesday with more respect than to continue the performances that have been going on for four or five Calendar Wednesdays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD admitted my charge that this is an unjustifiable filibuster. Does any man dare to stand up and defend this proceeding? You know good and well that you do not expect to pass this bill at this Congress. You know that it is perfectly impossible. Then why play buncombe as you are doing?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am not in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas. When the codification bill came before the House the first time on Calendar Wednesday, I raised the question of consideration. We had a roll call in the House on the question of consideration. This side of the House voted almost if not quite unanimously against the consideration of the bill, simply because of the time that would be consumed. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] voted in favor of the consideration of the bill, although he knew that if it was continued it would occupy Calendar Wednesday for a number of days. That side of the House quite generously voted against consideration, although my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], who just interrupted the gentleman from Arkansas, voted against the consideration.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] has taken a very active part in the actual consideration of this bill and has been here, I think, continuously. Last Wednesday I voted against the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], and later in the day went to a ball game. If there was a good ball game to-day, I do not know but that I would follow suit; and I am sure that my absence from the House last Wednesday after 3 o'clock did not in any way whatever delay the consideration or the expedition of this bill. [Laughter.]

If the House does not wish to consider the codification bill, it is a matter very easily arrived at. The House can refuse to consider it at any time; but this is an effort to break down Calendar Wednesday. Now, I appreciate the desire of my friend from Arkansas to expedite the public business in words, while in votes he is the one that is largely responsible for what he calls the pussy-footed filibuster. When we took the vote the Democratic side of the House voted for the consideration of this bill, in order to prevent other questions being reached for consideration of the House. We have got a situation now where Calendar Wednesday is occupied. We have had a bill made the continuing order which has not been taken up for consideration so that nothing else can come in except that bill if we happen on any day to run out of meat. We are now in the situation under the reform rules of the House where no nonprivileged matter can be reached or considered except by unanimous consent, or by the grace of the great mogul from Texas, chairman of the Committee on Rules, Mr. HENRY. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I thought I would get a rise from the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY. Does not the gentleman agree that the House is being fed enough grist to grind?

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Rules has now usurped the proper functions of the House. Where the House heretofore always had the power of determining for itself what it would consider, under the present rules, under the control of the Committee on Rules, we can not consider any matter unless it meets the approval of the Committee on Rules and, as I now understand, unless what is going into the bill meets with the approval of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman from Illinois and others frequently vote against the rule which the committee brings into the House.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; we do that frequently, the presumption in my mind being adverse to any bill brought in by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman if he continues that way, the crowd will grow smaller each day on that side of the House.

Mr. MANN. Very likely the gentleman has high hopes which he enunciates, though he does not have them in the bottom of his heart, for he knows, as everybody else in the House knows, that if an election were held to-day that side of the House could be put in two tiers of seats. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARNHART rose.

The SPEAKER. The time is exhausted.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to enforce the rule on this proposition.

Mr. BARNHART. Does the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. FOSTER. I think I will have to call for the regular order.

Mr. BARNHART. Very well. I will ask the gentleman not to forget that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], to dispense with Calendar Wednesday for to-day.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 12, noes 60.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas, 21, nays 229, answered "present" 9, not voting 174, as follows:

REVISION OF THE LAWS—JUDICIARY TITLE.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15578, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15578, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15578, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 75, line 1, after the word "States," strike out the words "are parties or have" and insert "is a party or has."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, owing to the confusion I could not hear the amendment read.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, it is simply to correct a grammatical error. It says "the United States are" and it should be "the Government is."

Mr. WINGO. I could not hear the amendment read.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 2, after the word "the," strike out "court or the commissioner" and insert in lieu thereof the word "officer."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 75, line 3, after the word "such," strike out "court or commissioner" and insert in lieu thereof the word "officer."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 130. Whenever any person indicted in a court of the United States makes affidavit, setting forth that there are witnesses whose evidence is material to his defense; that he can not safely go to trial without them; what he expects to prove by each of them; that they are within the district in which the court is held, or within 100 miles of the place of trial; and that he is not possessed of sufficient means, and is actually unable to pay the fees of such witnesses, the court in term, or any judge thereof in vacation, may order that such witnesses be subpœnaed if found within the limits aforesaid. In such case the costs incurred by the process and the fees of the witnesses shall be paid in the same manner that similar costs and fees are paid in case of witnesses subpœnaed in behalf of the United States.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 77, line 2, strike out "such witnesses" and insert in lieu thereof "all such witnesses as may be material and necessary."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 132. Any judge of the United States, on the application of a district attorney, and on being satisfied by proof that the testimony of any person is competent and will be necessary on the trial of any criminal proceeding in which the United States are parties or are interested, may compel such person to give recognizance, with or without sureties, at his discretion, to appear to testify therein; and for that purpose may issue a warrant against such person, under his hand, with or without seal, directed to the marshal or other officer authorized to execute process in behalf of the United States, to arrest and bring before him such person. If the person so arrested neglects or refuses to give recognizance in the manner required, the judge may issue a warrant of commitment against him, and the officer shall convey him to the prison mentioned therein. The said person shall remain in confinement until he is removed to the court for the purpose of giving his testimony, or until he gives the recognizance required by said judge.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 77, line 25, after the word "States," strike out the words "are parties or are" and insert in lieu thereof "is a party or is."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the chairman whether in his opinion he does not believe it is advisable to extend this same authority to proceedings and actions under the antitrust laws? The present section merely extends it to proceedings in criminal actions. I can conceive how it would be highly advisable to detain witnesses in proceedings under the antitrust laws. We know when proceedings are about to be instituted for a violation of the antitrust laws of the United States that sometimes witnesses find it convenient to make a hasty exit from this country. If we are going to make such a provision, this would be the proper place. I have prepared an amendment, somewhat hastily it is true, but as this bill will be submitted to the Senate for their consideration, I think perhaps it might be well to place it in this section, if the gentleman approves it, and when the bill goes over to the other body they may pass upon it and put it into complete and final form. I suggest to the gentleman that after the word "proceeding," in line 24, page 77, to insert these words, "in any proceeding, suit, or action under the antitrust laws of the United States."

Mr. WATKINS. I do not see any objection to that. It is true in this codification we deal with only one subject at a time, as near as we can, but the general rule of criminal law is applicable to that section which we are now considering. I do not see, however, that it will harm anything by putting it in.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman realizes here is one provision of the law which gives authority to the United States to detain necessary witnesses in criminal prosecutions.

Mr. WATKINS. I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to be inserted after the word "proceeding," in line 24, page 77.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 77, line 24, after the word "proceeding," insert the words "or in any proceeding, suit, or action under the antitrust laws of the United States."

Mr. BRYAN. This is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the amendment was adopted, and I withdraw the pro forma amendment and offer this.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, in this provision it is arranged that in criminal proceedings witnesses can be compelled to give recognizance, and if they do not, they go to jail, of course, or are detained in some way by the authorities. Now, that is all right in criminal proceedings, and all criminal proceedings under the antitrust laws would come within the provision as it is now worded, and if the amendment is adopted all civil proceedings under the antitrust laws would be subject to the same provision; and is it not subject to some question whether we should extend the right to detain witnesses and compel them to give recognizances, and, if they do not, for them to go to jail, in civil suits? I think that goes too far, and I hardly believe that the amendment ought to be adopted and the power extended to civil suits in any case. It is an entirely new departure, and the statute itself is broad enough to cover any criminal proceeding under the antitrust laws, so why make it cover civil proceedings?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield. The gentleman is quite well aware in the suits instituted for violations of the antitrust laws there are suits in equity. In these proceedings it is very necessary to have witnesses available when they would be needed to testify to prove the Government's case. They may be very wealthy persons, who can conveniently absent themselves when they have a fear that they are going to be compelled to testify in these trust proceedings.

I know the gentleman can see the efficacy and need of such a provision as this.

Mr. BRYAN. I can see what the gentleman from Wisconsin is driving at, but the very rich men to which he referred are held by the bond of public opinion, and the matter of a small money bond amounts to nothing to them. If the power of the court to punish for contempt of court would not detain them if they wanted to go and subject themselves to the contempt of court, as they do when a subpœna is served upon them and they disobey it, then a thousand-dollar bond would be nothing—absolutely nothing. In a trust case, where the Government sues a certain railroad, and the railroad determines to get a large number of laboring men, for instance, or employees, to attend the trial, they can cause all of those men to be put into jail if they can not give a bond to attend the trial, under this provision. Now, I think that is going entirely too far. I think that kind of a right ought not to be allowed in civil cases.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman recognizes they can not be put in jail, even in the extreme case the gentleman imagines, unless it has the approval of the judge of the United States court. Can the gentleman even, with his very easy imagination, conceive of a case where the judge of the United States court would imprison witnesses, as he refers to?

Mr. BRYAN. If the defendant corporation comes in and says, "Here are a lot of witnesses that are essential to establish the fact that we are not a trust, and we want them detained, and the law authorizes us to detain them," then the judge is going to say, "All right; detain them." And he would be expected to do so, and he would not be expected to use his discretion in such a way as take from this corporation the evidence. I do not think we ought to put on the books any authority in a civil case to any judge to require a body of citizens who have committed no offense to be tied up in this way. It is bad enough in criminal cases. A lot of times it is abused, and many times it works a great injustice, and I would not want to extend any such provision as that to a civil case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 8.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 133. Copies of any books, records, papers, or documents in any of the executive departments, or other Government establishments, authenticated under the seals of such departments or establishments, respectively, shall be admitted in evidence equally with the originals thereof.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to direct the attention of the committee, and particularly that of the chairman of the committee, to the following section and inquire as to the need of having section 134, and also other sections which cover this same authority, only in different language. I would like to inquire of the chairman whether this general authority now found in the pending section is not broad enough to cover the specific authority granted in the following section, which has identical language, and vests with the Solicitor of the Treasury the right to certify the documents, records, and papers in his office?

Mr. WATKINS. I will state to the gentleman that it is, in effect; that in several of the sections various officials of the various departments are authorized to give these certificates of record, and they are enumerated, and that grows out of the fact that at various times statutes have been enacted giving authority to one, then to another, as the departments were created. These authorities were given at various times, and we incorporated the language as found in the statute, except as shown in italics. We could have said generally all of the departments of the Government, but we did not think it was necessary to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the present section you are extending the scope so as to include other Government establishments.

Now, if the gentleman will look up the history of the next section he will find that it is section 2 of the act of February 22, 1849. The first section of that act conferred some authority that was not provided for generally, but even at that time this same authority was vested in the head of the executive department. In going over this bill I thought that this was somewhat out of the ordinary, and I called up the Solicitor of the Treasury this morning and pointed out to him the obvious duplication, and I was informed by his assistant that they are rarely called upon to furnish certification of records in their office; and it was his opinion that the general authority as found in section 133 was adequate. Now, if we are codifying and not merely just combining the laws—if we are really codifying the laws—I submit in all seriousness to the gentleman, what is the need of carrying in the statute a superfluous section in which similar authority is conferred in another existing section?

Mr. MANN. Where is the other section?

Mr. STAFFORD. Section 134—the one that follows. I contend it is merely superfluous, and that the authority contained in section 133 is fully adequate to confer the authority specially given in section 134. I did not wish to take it upon myself to strike out section 134 without making some inquiry; so this morning I called up the Solicitor of the Treasury and his assistant informed me that they have really little occasion to furnish certification of records in their office; and even if they would have, the authority found in section 133 would permit it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I think the two sections are somewhat mixed anyhow. Section 133 authorizes transcript of papers under the seal of the department. Section 134 authorizes transcript under the seal of the Solicitor of the Treasury. Now, there are a number of departments which have bureaus in them which have seals distinct from the seal of the department. That is the case, I think, with the Patent Office. We created a bureau here recently, giving it a seal.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman recognizes that if there was not existing this authority as found in section 134, if the certified copy of any documents had the seal of the department it would be considered as good evidence under the provisions of section 133.

Mr. MANN. If it had the seal of the department, it would be; but the Solicitor of the Treasury has a seal of his own.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the Solicitor of the Treasury informs me they have very little call for certified copies of documents in their office.

Mr. MANN. None of the departments have much call for it, except the Patent Office.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Indian Office——

Mr. MANN. And it is not a question of how much call you have. I think what is now in section 134 was originally put into the statutes because that office was given a seal of its own. But I remember that a number of the bureaus now have seals of their own, and really section 133 ought to be changed so that it would permit transcripts under the seal of the departments or a bureau in a department. Then section 134 would not be necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that would be changed accordingly, then we would obviate the need of section 135 and two or three of these following sections, which confer authority upon bureau chiefs for certification of documents in their respective bureaus.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The pro forma amendment will be considered withdrawn.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to make some remarks on this bill, but I shall ask unanimous consent to extend them in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD his remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 134. Copies of any documents, records, books, or papers in the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, certified by him under the seal of his office, or, when his office is vacant, by the officer acting as solicitor for the time, shall be evidence equally with the originals.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. The reason for striking out that paragraph has been stated by me in discussing the prior section. If I had not made inquiry of the Assistant Solicitor of the Treasury and ascertained that there is no need of this, and that there is an incongruity in these two provisions, I would not presume here to offer to strike it out; but I find upon inquiry that there is no need of it, that the language in the section preceding, general in form, will be ample to carry out all cases referred to in this section. I think the chairman should accept the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has the gentleman ever had any experience with the Solicitor of the Treasury? The Solicitor of the Treasury, as I understand it, has the records of suits pending in court. I have had occasion myself in one or two cases to procure copies of those records from the Department of Justice, in cases of forfeiture of bonds and appearances of parties in internal-revenue cases, and various things of that kind. The records of proceedings are kept in the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury. As I understand it, copies of records of what has been done and of the advice that is given are kept, and the records of the proceedings in the case; and it may become necessary, as I know it has been in two cases that came up from my district in Georgia, to consult the Solicitor of the Treasury and get copies of the records.

Mr. STAFFORD. I grant all that, because that is the function of this bureau. But I ask the gentleman—I recognize his erudition in law—whether the——

Mr. BARTLETT. That has been my experience; that is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether the general authority conferred in section 133 would not be all-sufficient to meet every case for a certified copy of any record in the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury. I was informed by the Assistant Solicitor of the Treasury this morning that this is mere surplusage.

Mr. BARTLETT. I doubt it, because this says "any of the executive departments or other Government establishments." I do not know what is meant by that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Solicitor of the Treasury is certainly a part of the executive department.

Mr. BARTLETT. The solicitor's office is not a department.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a part of the executive department. It is a bureau in an executive department.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is the solicitor's office. It is not a bureau or a department. I do not know whether it is a separate establishment, but it has officials of its own in the Department of the Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the smaller include the greater?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think so. I think if you wanted a record in the office of the solicitor, and got a copy thereof certified to by the Secretary of the Treasury, or some one authorized to so certify and attach the seal of the department to it, that would be permissible. That is my judgment about it as a lawyer. I apprehend that this provision was put in the statute for the convenience of the department and for the convenience of those who might require the certified copies of the papers or the records in that office, and not require you to go to the Secretary of the Treasury and have him investigate it, but go directly to the solicitor's office.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows that there are many other bureaus in the Treasury Department where cases develop for need of copies of their records, and they are all certified to by the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, I am told by the Assistant Solicitor of the Treasury that he is rarely called upon for certification of documents in his office, and I can not see any need for this separate provision.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be very glad to.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman is calling attention to the fact that there is a repetition in sections 135, 136, and 137.

Mr. STAFFORD. Particularly as to sections 133 and 134.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes. Does not the gentleman think that if we would amend section 133, in line 15, by inserting the word "bureaus" after the word "departments," so that it would read "copies of any books, records, papers, or documents in any of the executive departments, bureaus, or other Government establishments, authenticated under the seals of such departments," and again, in line 17, after the word "departments," insert the word "bureaus," so that it would read "under the seals of such departments, bureaus, or establishments, respectively," that would cover all the cases the gentleman has in mind, and that would make it possible to strike out that part?

Mr. STAFFORD. That would be truly a codification of the statutes. As I understand it, we are codifying and getting rid of the unnecessary sections in the existing laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes. I want to pursue this inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to what would be the situation if we passed this as it stands. It would lead to confusion, because, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] pointed out, there are a number of bureaus not mentioned in this bill which have seals. Now, if we should amend section 133 by inserting the word "bureaus," it would cover all of these cases.

Mr. STAFFORD. I certainly approve the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio. It would not only tend to relieve this bill of unnecessary sections, but it would be scientific in its administration, in throwing the work upon the respective bureaus. This is not a very delicate subject. If a document is lodged in any bureau, the seal of the bureau, if there is a seal, should be sufficient to carry an exemplification of it.

Mr. WILLIS. I think so. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 133 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Before the gentleman objects——

Mr. WATKINS. Reserving the right to object, there is no necessity at all for that. We propose to antagonize any effort to cut out section 134, and to give our reasons in due time.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman mean to say, then, that he intends to object?
